

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

APPOINTED TO MEET 5 MARCH, 1874, AND THENCE CONTINUED

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Thursday, 8th February, 1877.

THE PARLIAMENT, which had been Prorogued successively from the 15th day of August, 1876, to the 31st day of October; thence to the 12th day of December; thence to the 8th day of February, 1877, met this day for the Despatch of Business.

The Session of PARLIAMENT was opened by THE QUEEN in Person.

THE QUEEN'S SPEECH.

Throne, adorned with Her Crown and Regal Ornaments, and attended by Her Officers of State, (the Lords being in their robes)—commanded the Yeoman Usher of the Black Rod, through the Deputy Lord Great Chamberlain, to let the Commons know "It is Her Majesty's Pleasure they attend Her immediately, in this House."

suance of Her Majesty's Commands, delivered Her Majesty's Speech, as follows:—

"My Lords, and Gentlemen,

"It is with much satisfaction that I again resort to the advice and assistance of my Parliament.

"The hostilities which, before the close of last Session, had broken out between Turkey on the one hand and Servia and Montenegro on the other, engaged my most serious attention, and I anxiously waited for an opportunity when my good offices, together with those of my allies, might be usefully interposed.

"This opportunity presented itself by the solicitation of Servia for our mediation, the offer of which was ultimately entertained by the Porte.

"In the course of the negotiations I deemed it expedient to lay down and, in concert with the other Powers, to submit to the Porte certain bases upon which I held that not only peace might be brought about with the Principalities, but the permanent pacification of the disturbed provinces, including Bulgaria, and the amelioration of their condition, might be effected.

"Agreed to by the Powers, they required to be expanded and worked out by negotiation or by Conference, accompanied by an armistice. The Porte, though not accepting the bases and proposing other terms, was willing to submit them to the equitable consideration of the Powers.

"While proceeding to act in this mediation, I thought it right, after inquiry into the facts, to denounce to the Porte the excesses ascertained to have been committed in Bulgaria, and to express my reprobation of their perpetrators.

"An armistice having been arranged, a Conference met at Constantinople for the consideration of extended terms in accordance with the original bases, in which Conference I was represented by a Special Envoy, as well as by my Ambassador.

"In taking these steps, my object has throughout been to maintain the peace of Europe, and to bring about the better government of the disturbed provinces, without infringing upon the independence and integrity of the Ottoman Empire.

"The proposals recommended by myself and my allies have not, I regret to say, been accepted by the Porte; but the result of the Conference has been to show the existence of a general agreement among the European Powers, which cannot fail to have a material effect upon the condition and government of Turkey.

"In the meantime, the armistice between Turkey and the Principalities has been prolonged, and is still unexpired, and may, I trust, yet lead to the conclusion of an honourable peace.

"In these affairs I have acted in cordial co-operation with my allies, with whom, as with other foreign Powers, my relations continue to be of a friendly character.

"Papers on these subjects will be forthwith laid before you.

"My assumption of the Imperial title at Delhi was welcomed by the Chiefs and people of India with professions of affection and loyalty most grateful to my feelings.

"It is with deep regret that I have to announce a calamity in that part of my dominions which will demand the most earnest watchfulness on the part of my Government there. A famine not less serious than that of 1873 has overspread a large portion of the Presidencies of Madras and Bombay. I am confident that every resource will be employed not merely in arrest of this present famine, but in obtaining fresh experience for the prevention or mitigation of such visitations for the future.

"The prosperity and progress of my Colonial Empire remain unchecked, although the proceedings of the Government of the Transvaal Republic, and the hostilities in which it has engaged with the neighbouring tribes, have caused some apprehensions for the safety of my subjects in South Africa. I trust, however, that the measures which I have taken will suffice to prevent any serious evil.

"Gentlemen of the House of Commons,

"I have directed the Estimates of this year to be prepared and presented to you without delay.

"My Lords, and Gentlemen,

"Bills relating to the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge, and for amending the Law as to Bankruptcy and Letters Patent for Inventions, will be laid before you.

"Your attention will be again called to measures for promoting economy and efficiency in the management of the Prisons of the United Kingdom, which will, at the same time, effect a relief of local burthens.

"Bills will also be laid before you for amending the Laws relating to the Valuation of Property in England, for simplifying and amending the Law relating to Factories and Workshops, and for improving the Law regulating the summary jurisdiction of Magistrates.

Legislation will be proposed with reference to Roads and Bridges in Scotland, and the Scotch Poor Law.

"You will be asked to constitute one Supreme Court of Judicature in Ireland and to confer an equitable jurisdiction on the County Courts in that country.

"I commend to you these and other measures which may be submitted for your consideration, and I trust that the blessing of the Almighty will attend your labours and direct your efforts."

And then Her Majesty retired.

And the Commons withdrew.

The QUEEN'S SPEECH reported by The LORD CHANCELLOR.

VISCOUNT GREY DE WILTON, in rising to move that an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty in reply to the Speech from the Throne, said: My Lords, I have not often spoken in this House, and it is no light thing for a man to stand up and inflict himself on such a distinguished audience as this for the first time in a tight coat (alluding to his uniform), and I therefore crave the kind indulgence you are in the habit of showing to persons in my situation. I propose to detain your Lordships for a very short time, as I have no doubt you are anxious to hear the words of a younger Peer than myself, who is sitting below me on the Treasury Bench, and who will probably address your Lordships this evening. The first 10 or 12 paragraphs in Her Majesty's Speech are devoted to the all-absorbing question of the day, and in the presence of the three principal British actors in that great drama, it would be most unwarrantable for me to occupy your time by even the faintest sketch of the history of the past two years. That history will be told—I have no doubt well—by those who are competent to give you information, and upon their narrative, taken in conjunction with the Papers which have been promised us, you will form your judgment, unprejudiced, I hope, by the speeches of those who, in various parts of the country, have thought fit to attack the Government, although unfurnished with that information without which no true or just judgment can be formed. As might have been expected, the more hot-headed of the British public have already ranged themselves on one side or the other. There has been a Turkish and a Russian faction. A great deal of zeal has been manifested, not always, however, with discretion, a certain amount of injustice has been done, and a great many extravagant proposals have been made. For instance, I believe that in some quarters the Russian Emperor has been rather hardly dealt with, and his pacific declarations have been somewhat rudely pooh-poohed. It may be said that he cannot always speak for his Army, which on some occasions has got out of his hands; but the pacific assurances which he made to Lord Augustus Loftus were of so solemn and earnest a character, that it would have been wiser and more courteous to have given him credit for the sincerity of his intentions and for his ability to execute them. On the other hand, I cannot admire what has been termed the "bag and baggage policy," advocated, if not originated, by a very distinguished person. That cannot be a practical policy unless we are prepared to carry it out by force, which we are not. Even if we were, the offenders must live somewhere, and I cannot see the justice of forcing them, with all their sins, on another part of the globe, where they would probably be equally objectionable. One result of the wide discrepancy of opinion has been that the Government have received a great deal of miscellaneous advice, much of which has been of a nature rather to hamper than to assist it. I was not present to hear the will of the Nation proclaimed in St. James's Hall, because I was not furnished with the necessary ticket; but when I read the report next morning, and observed the nature of some of the advice, and, indeed, some of the orders showered on our Plenipotentiary, I could not help regretting that some, at least, of the orators had not remembered a useful precept which I have often read on board steamboats—"Do not speak to the man at the wheel." Some, however, do not take that view of the Conference at St. James's Hall, and I have heard it said that the voice of the people, expressed in the utterances to which I have referred, has compelled Her Majesty's Government, very much against the grain, to make a considerable change in their policy in reference to affairs in the East. There are those sitting below me who at the proper time will give explanations on that point, and I shall be much surprised if it be not found that Her Majesty's Government have, in fact, not made any material change in their policy. I believe it will be found that they have adhered, and still adhere, to the spirit of the Treaty of 1856—that though that Treaty had been considerably mutilated in 1871, and is by some considered a dead-letter, it is still in force, and that Her Majesty's Government have based their policy, and continue to base their policy, on the two cardinal points of that Treaty—namely, the preservation of the peace of Europe, and, secondly, the integrity and independence of the Ottoman Empire. Her Majesty's Government believed—and, indeed, it was obvious—that the last point involved this further position—that the Christian subjects of the Porte should, as far as was practicable, be in full possession of their liberties. In pursuance of these objects a Conference was assembled. The Members of that Conference deemed it necessary that the Porte should submit to certain guarantees for the performance of the promises which they had made. The guarantees demanded, originally of a very stringent nature, gradually assumed a milder and milder character; but they were alike rejected by the Porte, which practically declared that it would be bound by nobody but itself. The Conference, therefore, may in that sense be said to have failed; but in certain other respects the Conference has not been a failure—it has borne some fruit. It has demonstrated the unanimous desire of the six great Powers to preserve the peace of Europe, and it has extracted from the Porte a measure of reform unparalleled in Mahommedan annals, in the shape of a Constitution, promulgated with great ceremony, solemnly sworn to by the Sultan and his Ministers, and one which cannot but effect much good if it were only faithfully carried into effect. But will it be faithfully carried out? Well, I hope, at any rate, that we shall have patience, and allow the Turkish Government time and opportunity for working out these reforms. According to the intelligence that has reached us the successor of Midhat Pasha is bound to follow out the principles laid down by his predecessor in respect of the new Constitution. However that may be, I think that on a calm consideration of the whole of the subject, in all its bearings, your Lordships can hardly come to any other conclusion than that the conduct of Her Majesty's Ministers has been wise, dignified, and consistent. It may be that this question will eventuate in a European war, in which, sooner or later, the interests of this country will be directly or indirectly involved. In that event a heavy weight of responsibility will rest upon those who have the conduct of foreign affairs; and I am happy to think that the honour and interests of the country are safe in the keeping of my noble Relative below me. Nor can I doubt that my noble Friend will receive the approbation and support of the great majority of his fellow-countrymen. My Lords, I am happy to find that the assumption of the Imperial Title by Her Majesty at Delhi has been welcomed by the Chiefs and people of India with expressions of loyalty and affection. On the other hand, your Lordships will be grieved to hear that a part of Her Majesty's dominions in India have been visited by a famine, which has overspread a large part of the Presidencies of Madras and Bombay. The sufferings of the people of these districts have been, and must I fear continue to be, great; but we have already gained experience from former calamities of the same nature, and the despatch forwarded a few weeks since by the noble Earl (the Earl of Carnarvon), who has been acting in the absence of the noble Marquess the Secretary of State for India, will show that the authorities in that country are alive to the exigencies of the case, and are fully prepared to take the best possible means for preserving the lives of a population who are only too apt, in times of calamity, to resign themselves to their fate. My Lords, I am happy to find by the next paragraph of the Royal Speech that under the wise administration of the noble Earl the Secretary of State for the Colonies the prosperity and progress of our Colonial Empire continues unchecked, and we may fairly hope that the apprehensions that have arisen from the proceedings of the Transvaal Republic will, under the provident management of Her Majesty's Government, pass away without injurious consequences to our own fellow-subjects of the Cape Colony. My Lords, I do not propose to allude at any length to the various Bills announced in the concluding paragraphs of the Royal Speech. The Bill relating to the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge will, I suppose, be of a similar nature to the one affecting the University of Oxford introduced last Session. I can only hope that this measure will be more successful than the Bill of last year in "another place," and that the noble Marquess who has charge of it (the Marquess of Salisbury) will have the satisfaction of hearing it receive the Royal Assent. As to the measures relating to Bankruptcy, and Letters Patent for Inventions, I dismiss them, as too technical for me, with a hope that they may be found capable of dispelling those mists of inconvenience, which serve usually to obscure these objects. The Prisons Bill, I hope, will be successfully carried through Parliament; for, though some of the magistrates are naturally loth to part with their local control over prisons, there is a general feeling that some legislation is necessary, and that a better organization and a more efficient management will be effected under the Bill. A similar hope may be entertained with reference to the Valuation of Property Bill; because it is the principal stepping-stone towards settling the important question of local taxation. The Bills relating to Factories and Workshops are interesting and important, both to the working and to the manufacturing classes, and they may, I think, be safely left in the experienced hands of the Home Secretary. The Irish Judicature Bill will be complementary of the Judicature Act passed for this country, and will have the effect of constituting one uniform system of judicature for the two countries. The Scotch Bills I may safely leave to my noble Friend who is to second my Motion, and I am sure that the noble Earl will do them justice. The programme put forth by the Government is not heroic in dimensions or constitution; it embodies an honest attempt to deal with the most pressing wants of the day. I venture to think that it is a manageable programme; and we may fairly hope that most of the measures will, with due co-operation from both sides, escape the annual July Massacre. But that co-operation is a very important factor; and I am sure it will not be necessary to appeal to the fairness of noble Lords opposite. They will doubtless watch the action of the Government with vigilance; they will probable criticize them with severity; but they will assuredly give their generous assistance to the passing of good and useful measures, knowing, as they well know, that they are measures devised by men who are only vying with them as to who shall most contribute to the honour, interest, and welfare of the country.

My Lords, I will conclude by moving that an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, thanking Her Majesty for Her Majesty's most Gracious Speech from the Throne, as follows:—

MOST GRACIOUS SOVEREIGN,

"WE, Your Majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, the Lords Spiritual and Temporal, in Parliament assembled, beg leave to offer our humble thanks to Your Majesty for the most gracious Speech which Your Majesty has addressed to both Houses of Parliament.

"We humbly thank Your Majesty for informing us that the hostilities which, before the close of last Session, had broken out between Turkey on the one hand and Servia and Montenegro on the other, have engaged Your Majesty's most serious attention, and that Your Majesty anxiously waited for an opportunity when Your Majesty's good offices, together with those of Your allies, might be usefully interposed.

"We humbly thank Your Majesty for informing us that this opportunity presented itself by the solicitation of Servia for mediation, the offer of which was ultimately entertained by the Porte.

"We humbly thank Your Majesty for informing us that in the course of the negotiations Your Majesty deemed it expedient to lay down and, in concert with the other Powers, to submit to the Porte certain bases upon which Your Majesty held that not only peace might be brought about with the Principalities, but that the permanent pacification of the disturbed provinces, including Bulgaria, and the amelioration of their condition, might be effected.

Viscount Grey De Wilton

"We humbly thank Your Majesty for informing us that these bases, agreed to by the Powers, required to be expanded and worked out by negotiation or by Conference, accompanied by an armistice; and that the Porte, though not accepting the bases and proposing other terms, was willing to submit them to the equitable consideration of the Powers.

"We humbly thank Your Majesty for informing us that while proceeding to act in this mediation, Your Majesty thought it right, after inquiry into the facts, to denounce to the Porte the excesses ascertained to have been committed in Bulgaria, and to express Your Majesty's reprobation of the perpetrators.

"We humbly thank Your Majesty for informing us that an armistice having been arranged, a Conference met at Constantinople for the consideration of extended terms in accordance with the original bases, in which Conference Your Majesty was represented by a Special Envoy, as well as by Your Majesty's Ambassador.

"We humbly thank Your Majesty for informing us that in taking these steps it has been Your Majesty's object throughout to maintain the peace of Europe, and to bring about the better government of the disturbed provinces, without infringing on the independence and integrity of the Ottoman Empire.

"We share Your Majesty's regret that the proposals recommended by Your Majesty, and by Your Majesty's allies, have not been accepted by the Porte; but we trust that the general agreement among the European Powers, as shown by the Conference, will not fail to have a material effect upon the condition and government of Turkey.

"We humbly thank Your Majesty for informing us that the armistice between Turkey and the Principalities has been prolonged, and we join with Your Majesty in hoping that it will yet lead to the conclusion of an honourable peace.

"We humbly thank Your Majesty for informing us that Your Majesty has acted in cordial co-operation with your allies, with [whom, as with other foreign Powers, Your Majesty's relations continue to be of a friendly character.

"We rejoice that Your Majesty's assumption of the Imperial title at Delhi has been welcomed by the Chiefs and people of India with professions of affection and loyalty.

"We share Your Majesty's deep regret that a serious famine has overspread a large portion of the Presidencies of Madras and Bombay, but we are confident that every resource will be employed to meet the calamity.

"We humbly thank Your Majesty for informing us that the prosperity and progress of Your Majesty's Colonial Empire remain unchecked, and that measures have been taken with a view to the safety of Your Majesty's subjects in South Africa.

"We humbly assure Your Majesty that our careful consideration shall be given to the measures which may be submitted to us, and that we earnestly trust that the blessing of the Almighty will attend our labours and direct our efforts."

THE EARL OF HADDINGTON said, that in seconding his noble Friend's Motion he also must claim that indulgence which was invariably extended to those who for the first time addressed their Lordships' House. He was sure it was a subject of heartfelt pleasure, not to their Lordships only, but to the nation at large, that Her Majesty had once again been able to realize her intention of opening Her Parliament in person. Since Her Majesty performed that function last year, a new dignity had been added to the Crown; and though in the eyes of Englishmen no additional luster could be shed upon the Crown thereby, yet in India the new title of Empress of India had been hailed with much satisfaction, and had called forth the expressions of pleasure from Her Majesty's feudatories of their just appreciation of Her illustrious protectorate. Before adverting to the various topics mentioned in Her Majesty's Speech, he could not but congratulate their Lordships on the first appearance among them there as a Peer of the noble Earl at the head of Her Majesty's Government. He would not attempt to pay compliments to the noble Earl; but he congratulated the House of Lords on the accession to its ranks of one who in the other House of Parliament had never taken part in a debate without elevating its tone. Referring now to the various topics mentioned in the Speech from the Throne, they all remembered with what gloomy forebodings the last Session was closed—hostilities were then being waged in Eastern Europe between Turkey and Servia, and the last gleam of hope that European peace might be maintained seemed to have gone—when they heard with rejoicing that owing to the judicious attitude of Her Majesty's Government

Turkey and Russia had been brought face to face, and had been induced to pause and to weigh the issues of a threatened conflict in Europe, and by these means, for the present at least, the dangers of a general war had been averted. And if the efforts of those assembled in Conference at Constantinople had, to a certain extent, failed to adjust the difficulty in the way that was desired, yet they had at least brought about an indefinite adjournment of the threatened occupation of the Christian Provinces, had brought the Porte face to face with her responsibilities; and the fresh life and vigour introduced into existing Treaties were some proofs that the policy of Her Majesty's Government, in unison with her allies, had to a great extent been successful. He would not enter into details, but he might repeat what his noble Friend the Mover of the Address had said—that the basis on which the policy of the English Cabinet had been formed had been adherence to existing Treaties, to ameliorate the condition of the Christian subjects of Turkey without hazarding the peace of Europe or infringing the integrity of the Ottoman Empire. Within the last few days an unforeseen event had occurred, the exact result of which it was at present difficult to foresee; but they might hope that the fall of the Minister who inaugurated the policy of reform would not involve the destruction of his schemes, and that his successor would prove to be a statesman who was able and willing to carry out the much-needed changes proposed by Midhat Pasha. With regard to the reference which the Speech from the Throne contained to our Colonial dominions, it was satisfactory to find that peace had not been seriously threatened, while what had occurred afforded an additional reason for the extension of the principle of federation which had been successfully carried in some of the Colonies. He looked with satisfaction on the proposed legislation in respect to roads and bridges in Scotland and the Scotch Poor Law, which he hoped would result in economy and efficiency. The noble Earl concluded by seconding the Address. [See page 12.]

EARL GRANVILLE: My Lords, I rise to address a few observations to your Lordships—more in deference to long-established custom than from any belief that any discussion can be advantageously raised on our side of the House without further information. My Lords, the noble Earl who seconded the Motion for the Address (the Earl of Haddington) only gave utterance to a feeling entertained by the entire House when he said your Lordships must all rejoice that the present Session of Parliament has been opened by Her Majesty in person; and I am glad that the Speech from the Throne is framed so as to make it not only easy for, but incumbent on us to adopt the Address moved in reply. My Lords, the attention of Parliament, in common with that of the whole country, seems to be concentrated at this moment on one question of foreign policy, of the importance of which we have evidence in the fact of so many paragraphs on the subject being inserted in the Queen's Speech. No doubt we shall hear a good deal of that question this evening; but it would be quite idle for us on this side of the House to attempt to debate it in the absence of full information on the question. I am glad that, contrary to the precedent of last Session, the Papers are to be laid on the Table forthwith. I am not equally glad to have seen it officially announced in The Morning Post and Daily Telegraph that the whole documents extend to not fewer than 1,200 folios.

And now, before proceeding to notice some of the topics referred to in the Queen's Speech, may I say one word expressive of my pleasure in hearing the agreeable manner—the facility of speech tempered with that genial tone which is peculiarly agreeable to your Lordships—in which an old friend of mine, and the son of a still older friend, moved the Address in Answer to that Speech. The noble Earl who followed my noble Friend, alluded in graceful terms to the circumstance of the Prime Minister being now a Member of your Lordships' House. I am not sure that it is particularly my part to express unmixed feelings of satisfaction at such an accession to the benches opposite, or that one so great a master of debate should be added to our opponents already on those benches; but without any undue compliment to the noble Earl, I may say that a seat in your Lordships' House is not an unworthy reward for a statesman who has spent a long public and Parliamentary life. And while on personal subjects I may observe, my Lords, that I should not be doing justice to my own feelings, nor to those of noble Lords on this side of the House who are accustomed to act with me, if I did not state that the admirable temper and tact of the noble Duke the Lord President of the Council (the Duke of Richmond and Gordon), who naturally waives the place of the Leader of this House to the noble Earl the Prime Minister, have contributed very largely to the satisfactory character of the debates in your Lordships' House.

I will not trouble your Lordships with any remarks on the Bills which Her Majesty's Government announced their intention of introducing. Some of them are old friends, but old or new, I will not now enter into the merits of them; but there are one or two omissions to which I think I may be pardoned for calling attention. The subject of Burials is one which has excited much attention and feeling in the country. Last year the noble Duke gave what, I think, was gratefully accepted by the right rev. Bench as a pledge that the Government would themselves take charge of a Bill relating to Burials. I regret to observe that in the Speech from the Throne there is no allusion to any such Bill, except it is contained in the words "other measures." I think that there should have been more explicit reference to a measure of such importance if it be the intention of the Government to introduce a Bill. My Lords, there is one phrase in this Speech which we have sometimes heard before now. I allude to the words "economy and efficiency," which on this occasion are used in reference to the management of the Prisons of the country. In former times it had a wrong significance. I must say in reference to "economy," that, though in times of great prosperity the word became somewhat unpopular, there are symptoms that among all classes—the agricultural as well as the commercial classes—it is likely to recover something of its former popularity. With regard to "efficiency," it puts me in mind of another omission. Last year I called attention to a scheme for the improvement of Dover Harbour, and I showed that it was a question, not merely of local convenience, or one of convenience to commerce or Continental traffic, but one which, having been examined and reported upon by all the military and naval authorities of the country, had been declared for years to be absolutely urgent and necessary to the proper position of the naval and military defences of this country; so much so that Her Majesty's late Government agreed upon a self-supporting scheme, which the present Government naturally considered. It was referred to a Committee; that Committee recommended that the scheme should be proceeded with, and threw out the suggestion that it might be well to consider whether, for a very small cost, even greater facilities might be given. Her Majesty's present Government thereupon took 18 months to look into that suggestion; and at the end of last year I asked my noble Friend the question whether the Government had abandoned the scheme altogether; and he, without an absolute pledge, gave me an encouraging answer. When we got the answer, exactly 10 days before our notice could be given, it was a distinct intimation that the Government did not mean to go on with the scheme, and that if we could get the sanction of the War Office, and of the Admiralty, we were at liberty to take any steps we liked. At another time I might show that that delay is one which will be very injurious to the scheme. I might mention another small incident illustrating the mode of doing business on the part of the Government. In the beginning of November we, the Harbour Board, proposed to take over the Admiralty Pier. We were hurt at getting no answer for two months, but on the first day of this year a storm arose, the ocean was roused, a great portion of the pier to which I refer was thrown into the sea, and I can assure your Lordships that all our sensitiveness has disappeared under the consolation that some £30,000 or £40,000 will remain upon the public taxpayer instead of on the locality. With reference to another paragraph of the Queen's Speech, it is satisfactory to learn that the prosperity and progress of the Colonies remain unchecked; and with respect to the Papers bearing on the proceedings of the Transvaal Republic, I venture to express a hope that when the information on that subject is printed we shall not have to wait twelve months, as in the former instance, before the information is distributed. A very serious matter for consideration is to be found in the state of South Africa—it is unquestionably a very grave question. An article has recently been given to the public, in which my noble Friend the Secretary for the Colonies is extolled to the skies, and in which the late Secretary for the Colonies and myself were, I am afraid, sent to a very different place. It is not for me to dissent from an estimate of the personal worth of any individuals; but I do hope and expect that the policy of the Secretary for the Colonies will not be governed by the policy laid down in that article, and that the adoption of more judicious views will lead the efforts of my noble Friend to a successful termination. I am glad to see that my noble Friend does not dissent. At the same time, I am happy to congratulate my noble Friend on the appointment of Sir Bartle Frere to the post to which he has been appointed in South Africa, and I hope that all apprehension in respect of our colonial possessions there will soon be at an end. There are two paragraphs in the Speech from the Throne which refer to India, and which remind us sadly of the inevitable manner in which in this life the brilliant and mournful sides of affairs are commingled. With regard to the assumption of the Imperial title at Delhi, there have been criticisms, and there may be more; but the advisability of giving emphasis to that assumption appeared intended to meet the views of those who have held that it would be of the greatest use in India, and to allay the feeling of the minority in this country who feared some tampering with the title in this country to which we are all so much attached; and, without reference to particulars, I am disposed to think that, on the whole, some display was wise. Now, as to the Eastern Question—I shall only speak as to what is, more or less, within the knowledge of all of us. It does appear to me, notwithstanding what has been said by my noble Friend on the other side who moved the Address, that there have been two phases in the policy of Her Majesty's Government on this question. I quite agree with my noble Friend that the policy of Her Majesty's Government was the maintenance of the Treaty of 1856, and non-intervention on our part, and on the part of the other Powers, in the internal affairs of Turkey. Those may have been desirable objects;

but they have been strained to the utmost. I venture to assert, as I asserted last year, that the rights conferred on Turkey by the Treaty of Paris were not unaccompanied by the moral claims and rights which that Treaty gave to all Europe in reference to the Christian subjects of the Porte. And perhaps I may here be allowed to say a word about the Treaty of Paris. My Lords, I am not one of those who think that the Treaty of Paris is gone. I am not one of those who think that the Treaty of Paris ought to go. On the contrary, I think that Treaty is one of very considerable importance, and of great use to all the Powers who participated in its provisions. I think it secured great political advantages. It is of great importance in respect of the freedom of the Danube, and it lays down rules which are valuable in respect to the relations of the Six Powers in checking selfish or interested views on the part of any particular Power. But, on the other hand, I entirely deny that the Turks are in the position with respect to that Treaty which they occupied when it was first made. I was a Member of the Government who were a party to the making of that Treaty; and I am not sure, now when we can look back with the eye of experience, that it would not have been better, following the line suggested in a memorandum to be found in the Life of the Prince Consort, that it would not have been better to have refused to make that Treaty except on the condition of receiving security at the hands of Turkey for the good government of the Christian Provinces. But, I believe through a chivalrous feeling towards those by whose side we had fought, we consented to be satisfied with a declaration on the part of the Porte. It must, however, be always borne in mind that the declaration in question is solemnly embodied in the Treaty itself, and I hold that the fact of the declaration having been so embodied, the Treaty gives to the Powers a right, and throws upon them the obligation, to step in and see that the declaration is not thrown aside. Some accusations on this subject have been made against the Liberal Party. It has been said, and perhaps it may be said again, "Why did not you, the Liberal Party, during the 20 years, or the greater part of that time, you were in power, act on your right and obligation in respect of that declaration? You did not do so." And, especially, "Why in 1871 did you confirm this Treaty?" All I can say, in answer to the first charge, is that the Liberal Party did act in precisely the way that has been suggested in the question. In 1858, Lord Stratford de Redcliffe gave to the Porte the strongest possible intimation that it must not rely on the support of England if it did not carry out the promises contained in the declaration. Then, in 1860, when outrages of a very horrible character were enacted in Lebanon, in a short time after their occurrence, Lord John Russell agreed with the French Government that the district should be occupied by French troops. Lord John Russell, you will remember, sent out a Commission, at the head of which was my noble Friend Lord Dufferin, and that Commission gave to the population there what I believe to be one of the best models for the government of the Christians of Turkey, which has worked most successfully up to the present time. As giving you some idea of the state of matters in the Lebanon at that time, I may mention that 5,500 persons were murdered, and that there were some 20,000 women and children wandering about in a state of starvation. Your Lordships will remember that the outrages of Damascus were not suffered to pass unnoticed by the Government of this country. The Secretary for Foreign Affairs sent out a despatch, and punishment was inflicted on the offenders—the Governor of Damascus himself suffering the extreme penalty of the law. In 1871 the Turkish Ambassador came to me, and I told him that his Government must not think that Turkey could rely on this country in all possible contingencies. I made that communication also to Sir Henry Elliot; and I told him that in my opinion it was not fair that Turkey should labour under such a delusion as to suppose, that whatever she did, she could rely on the support of Europe, and of this country, and that she must look as one of her main safeguards to the good government of her Christian subjects—that she should make them feel that their lot was better under Turkish rule than under any other Government likely to be found. Last year I was at some pains to explain the alterations which were made in the Treaty of Paris in 1871; and I said I considered that an improvement had been made. The noble Viscount opposite (Viscount Grey de Wilton) seemed to think we desired to mutilate it; but I remember the Turkish Ambassador immediately the Conference was over saying to me that Russia, while thinking she had gained an advantage for herself, had given to the Turks exactly the one thing they desired. The alteration made in 1871 was at a time when France and Germany were engaged in war, and when there was very great public excitement, and when it would have been madness, even if it had been necessary, which I do not admit, to open up all the questions connected with the Treaty. To return to the policy of Her Majesty's Government last year, I feel certain that extreme desire for the maintenance of the status quo was one that influenced to an extraordinary extent all the thoughts, words, and actions of Her Majesty's Government. It was this that made the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs so sanguine that in the early part of 1875 he told us publicly that we should never hear any more of the insurrection in Herzegovina. It was this feeling that made them agree to the Andrassy Note, and which afterwards led not only to the rejection of the Berlin Memorandum, but to the mode in which it was rejected. At this time last year I ventured to say that if Her Majesty's Government were right in rejecting that proposal in the then actual state of affairs, I could not conceive that they were not wrong in not meeting that proposal with a counter proposal of their own, instead of meeting that objection, as they did, with a non possumus. The course taken by the Government upon the Berlin Memorandum had a great effect upon the public mind. Well, in the Autumn, the Prime Minister, then a Peer, speaking at a non-political dinner at Aylesbury, on the very eve of the election of the Member who succeeded him in the representation for the county in Parliament, made, nevertheless, a political speech. In that speech he recapitulated the charge against the Government, and denied that there was the slightest foundation for it; he said that, on the contrary, the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs had at once laid down the true principles of the Eastern Question, and that the Government were in daily, and even in hourly, communication with the other Governments on the subject. A noble Duke (the Duke of Argyll) has already called attention to this subject, and, so far as I can tell, there is not the slightest trace in the Papers that have been published of any such laying down of any principle in the noble Earl's communication; but the contrary. The Memorandum was written on the 19th of May; and on the 2nd of June the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs wrote to Vienna to express his regrets that he was unable to do more than express his regret at not being able to act with the other Powers who had concurred in the Berlin Memorandum. Certainly that was not the laying down of any principle. On the 12th of June the noble Earl told Count Schouvaloff that in his view nothing remained except to allow the renewal of hostilities until success should have declared itself on one side or the other. On the 22nd of June the noble Earl told Count Beust that there was nothing to be done. On the 31st of July the noble Earl told your Lordships that the soreness of the Powers made it a bad moment to propose anything, even if they had any proposal to make. And yet the noble Earl at the head of the Government, in his speech on the 9th of November, said—

“We did propose some propositions on our own part. My noble Friend lost no time in laying down the principles upon which he thought the tranquillity of the East of Europe might be secured. That is to say, he laid down the principles upon which he thought that the relations between the Porte and its Christian subjects ought to be established. These communications were occurring constantly, I may say, between Her Majesty's Government and the five other Powers. If you wish me to sum up in two sentences the result of what was, of course, daily and hourly communication between the Powers or their Representatives in England, I must tell you this—that I think that in the late Spring of this year peace, and peace on principles which would have been approved by every wise and good man, might have been accomplished. What happened? That happened which was not expected—Servia declared war on Turkey.”

Unless I am perfectly wrong in these facts, it follows that the memory of the noble Earl at the head of the Government, when he made his speech at Aylesbury, was confused as to dates, and that he attributed to one period events that had really happened at another. And it should be a lesson to us all that persons even of great authority do not always pay attention to dates, and that it is not beneath them to be accurate even in details. It cannot be denied that about this time some change came over the spirit of Her Majesty's Government in regard to their policy in the East. The noble Viscount (Viscount Grey de Wilton) denies that there has been any change, and I saw by the papers that a Member of Her Majesty's Government denied that there had been any change in their policy on the Eastern Question. Another important Member of Her Majesty's Government, who is now the Leader of the House of Commons (Sir Stafford Northcote) has stated it to be not so much that there had been a change in the policy of the Government as that there had been a change of circumstances, and that if they had made a change it was no more than a man did who put on a great coat in winter and took it off in summer. The metaphor, however, cannot be made to stand on four legs. The case is rather that of a man who omitted to wear his great coat in winter, and who, finding himself exceedingly chilled, put it on in the dog-days. Of course he would find that he had put it on too late, and that he was almost as much hampered with it as he had been before inconvenienced by the want of it. If the noble Viscount thinks that Her Majesty's Government have not been influenced by public opinion in their foreign policy he is much in error. There was last autumn a great explosion of public opinion which I ventured to say in a letter published at the time, would be found irresistible. What was it that excited it? I pass by the motives attributed to certain persons who engaged in the agitation that arose, and will only assert that the circumstances that called forth that excitement were quite sufficient to explain the hold which the subject exercised upon the public mind. I will ask whether such horrors as those which were perpetrated in Bulgaria ought not to excite some feeling among the people of this country? I do not wish to use my own words in describing these horrors—still less will I use the burning words of the noble Duke behind me (the Duke of Argyll) lest your Lordship should think me inclined to be sensational. I will take the description given at a somewhat late period by two of Her Majesty's Ministers

—one of them in his official capacity. I will read a few out of several sentences which I might quote from Lord Derby's despatch of the 21st of September—

"Crimes, which Mr. Baring justly describes as the most heinous that have stained the history of the present century. Little or nothing has been done in the way of reparation. The Porte has been led to promote and decorate officials whose acts have been at once a disgrace and an injury to the Turkish Empire. Acts of violence will continue, and the Porte is powerless or sapine."

And so on. I entirely agree in the description of the horrors there given. The only point on which I disagree with them is that both Ministers attribute these horrors to the weakness and inactivity of the Porte. I have little doubt that they were the consequence of orders from home, and I should be glad to know what is the opinion of the noble Marquess (the Marquess of Salisbury) on this point. These horrors were quite sufficient to excite the feelings of statesmen of all classes in this country. I need not refer to the statements that have been sometimes made that the occurrences to which I refer were accidental, for these statements have already been disposed of. But what did we find very soon after the events of which I speak were known at Constantinople? We find that the perpetrators of atrocities had been promoted and decorated; I must say that the declarations and the promotions and the decorations given to those who were regarded as responsible for these horrors, looked very much as if they had the sanction of the Turkish Government. It did not require the audacious statement of one of the Pashas to justify us in saying that the Turkish Government made itself the accomplice of more than half the acts committed in these provinces. Well, what did our Government do after that time? I have before me a Note which was addressed to the Porte, and it contains not the slightest statement of the grounds upon which this Government had a right to dictate to an independent nation; but it went on, in the words of the paragraph in the Speech from the Throne, "to denounce to the Porte the excesses ascertained to have been committed in Bulgaria, and to express My reprobation of their perpetrators." The whole Note was couched in more imperious terms than I think ever had been used before in any Note from one Government to another independent country; and it ended with a positive demand for reparation and for the punishment of offenders who were mentioned by name. I should like to ask the noble Earl the Foreign Secretary—what has been the result of the Note, if there has been any? What amount of reparation has been granted? Who are the officials who have been severely punished? Have the Government or have they not any information as to what has been stated in the newspapers that cruelties of a horrible description are still being perpetrated by the Turks upon the Christians? My Lords, I do say that Her Majesty's Government had changed their policy when they began writing such Notes to a friendly and independent Government. I have no doubt that some proposals were afterwards made which very much resembled the proposals that were made by the Russian Ambassador before Servia declared war; and as to which I stated last year, I could not conceive why they were refused by Her Majesty's Government. All these different acts do show a very great change of policy on the part of Her Majesty's Government; and I desire in the most absolute manner to state that I think such a change requires no defence. It was most wise and most statesmanlike on the part of Her Majesty's Government to make such a change, and to concede something to what after all formed the great mass of public opinion in dealing with such a subject. It is curious how history repeats itself. In 1791 Mr. Pitt, out of dread of Russia, and in consequence of the want of success in reconciling Russia and the Porte, proposed to Parliament to increase the fleet, which in the language of the day, was called the Russian Armament. It appeared that he did so in opposition to the views of some of his Colleagues. In the Lords an Amendment was immediately moved by Lord Fitzwilliam, and supported by Lords Loughborough and Porchester (the Whig ancestor of the noble Earl opposite), by Lords Carlisle, Stormont, and Lansdowne. In the Commons, Mr. Coke, of Norfolk, moved an Amendment, and the proposal of the Government was opposed by all the great Whigs of that day—Fox, Grey, Wyndham, and Burke. Mr. Fox made a most eloquent speech—we should think it rather a violent speech in these days. He used the strongest language against the Prime Minister. He said the Prime Minister had enveloped himself in mystery and importance and had explained nothing; that his speech was like the speech in the play—finely confused and very alarming. Mr. Fox denounced the Turk. He said that all that was holy in religion, and all that was moral and humane, demanded an abhorrence of everything which would strengthen the power of that cruel and wasteful Empire. Mr. Pitt, notwithstanding his large majorities in both Houses, yielded and withdrew his proposal, and grounded his explanation on the fact that in this country it was necessary to act in concurrence with the general opinion of the people. Lord Stanhope, in briefly narrating the story, states that this concession to popular feeling averted a Parliamentary danger. "But," he adds, "the whole transaction tended to dim his Parliamentary fame. Here was manifestly a miscalculation, and a failure in his foreign policy." I need hardly say, my Lords, that I do not look forward to any such fate as respects the policy of those who hold power at the present period. I ought to add one thing which happened in the autumn—namely, that the usual rumours prevailed that there were dissensions in the Cabinet. I am too old a bird to be caught by the chaff of outsiders on the subject of "dissensions in the Cabinet." I have known them so frequently wrong, and in this case their non-existence is placed absolutely beyond doubt by the assertions of the President of the Council and Sir Stafford Northcote. I must say, however, that this time the outsiders have a little more to say for themselves than they usually have. In the first place, the noble Lord the Secretary for Foreign Affairs had some years ago not only formed, but published his opinion as to the utter decrepitude of the Turks and the wisdom and policy of conciliating the Christian subjects of the Porte. Another very eminent Member of the Cabinet had some years ago been rather harshly reproved by the noble Earl opposite, then Chancellor of the Exchequer, for his very indistinct notions with respect to the relations existing between the Turks and Christians. At the same time there have been the greatest differences in the expressions used in public by Members of the Cabinet; and we all remarked the differences in tone between the speeches of the Foreign Secretary and those of the Prime Minister, which became still more remarkable after their change of policy. The noble Earl the Secretary for the Colonies was thanked by the pro-Christians in this country for the sympathy he had shown with the calamities of the Bulgarian population—he had not a single word to say on behalf of the Turks. The Home Secretary used very strong language in the same sense, and Sir Stafford Northcote not only denounced the atrocities, but gave us the best possible advice—which I was glad to hear repeated by the noble Lord the Mover of the Address—that it was wrong to be too distrustful of Russia, and that we ought to behave in a friendly way towards her. Now, what has been the line taken by the Prime Minister? When the Marquess of Hartington came back from Constantinople in October he had to speak in public almost immediately. No one sees things more clearly than the noble Marquess does; and in that public speech he said—

"My chief experience at Constantinople was this—that the difficulty of moving the Turks is their conviction that whether they did these things or not England would support them in the end."

What did the noble Earl the Prime Minister say? Speaking at Guildhall, he ridiculed the political steps taken by Russia, and taunted her with her inability to carry on a lengthened campaign. He did more than that; he entirely omitted to mention that declaration made, on his solemn honour, by the Emperor of Russia to our Representative. I say that that declaration of the Emperor, whether the noble Earl attached any importance to it or not, was a matter of fact which ought not to have been concealed. The only explanation I can give of these differences of language is one suggested by a friend of mine, who has not been in a Cabinet. He said he had often understood that Cabinets agreed to differ in private and agree in public, but in this case Her Majesty's Government seemed to have agreed to agree in private and to differ in public. They may act on the principle of a French nobleman who, being asked once a year by his Monarch how many children he had, invariably answered, "Two," until on one occasion he said, "Six;" and on the Monarch expressing some surprise said—"I am afraid of boring your Majesty by always saying the same thing." Perhaps some such reason as this may be the explanation of the differing opinions expressed by the Members of Her Majesty's Government on this subject. Passing from this to the Conference, I have next to remark that we labour under some difficulty in dealing with that subject, owing to the absence of the information which we hope to have soon. We do not know what were the Instructions given to the noble Marquess on going out, and what were the Instructions sent to him while at Constantinople; we are not aware, from official sources, what communications passed between the different Powers; and we are imperfectly informed of what passed at the Conference itself. All this will require to be known before I will venture to give any opinion with reference to the Conference, or to the manner in which the negotiations were carried out. I trust that on reading the Papers we shall not be tempted to repeat the language of a Leader of the Opposition in the House of Commons in July, 1864, in reference to another Conference. He said—

"One word with respect to the Conference. I never was of opinion that the Conference would arrive at any advantageous result. I could not persuade myself, after reading the Papers, that, whatever might be the cause, any one seriously wished for a settlement. The Conference lasted six weeks. It wasted six weeks—and, like a carnival, it lasted as long as a carnival—it was an affair of masks and mystification. Our Ministers went to it as men in distressed circumstances go to a place of amusement—to wile away the time with a consciousness of impending failure."—[3 Hansard, clxxvi. 743.]

Some one of your Lordships will probably have some recollection of having used this language. I am quite sure, whatever effect the Papers may produce as to the seriousness and earnestness of other persons, we shall find that the noble Marquess was sincere and earnest in his work at that Conference, to which he went with the approbation of the whole country and of all classes of political opinion, even including those to whom exclusively Party motives have been attributed. There is one more point on which the people of this country are still more desirous to learn something. They wish to know what is to be the result of the Conference? My noble Friend, in moving the Address, stated that the Conference was not a failure, inasmuch as it had introduced a much better understanding between the European Powers, and I am very glad to find that this opinion is confirmed by Her Majesty's Speech. I have no desire to question that opinion. I think in all probability it is true, and I rejoice in the thought that the good understanding between the European Powers has been promoted and the proper influence—I do not mean the overweening influence of this country—has been renewed after being disturbed by what occurred immediately after the Berlin Memorandum. The paragraph in Her Majesty's Speech in relation to this point states that—

"The proposals recommended by myself and my Allies have not, I regret to say, been accepted by the Porte; but the result of the Conference has been to show the existence of a general agreement among the European Powers, which cannot fail to have a material effect upon the condition and Government of Turkey."

Now, my Lords, that can be interpreted in two different ways. It is as much as to say—and I thought the noble Viscount indicated that to be his view—that we mean to make use of our influence with the other Courts of Europe, while maintaining our protest against the conduct of Turkey, to watch whether she carries into effect her promises towards her Christian subjects; and that, although we have taken the very strong step of recalling not only our extraordinary Ambassador, but also our ordinary Ambassador, we are not to proceed any further—that we are to look upon the Constitution which has been promulgated as a real and practical measure for the amelioration of Turkey, and not one which was properly treated by the Conference as something very like a sham, invented for a special purpose. If that is the line we are to take ourselves and try to induce the rest of Europe to adopt it, what will be the result? One of two things will happen—Either Russia, from policy or caution, moderation or weakness, may abstain and do nothing—in that case does anyone seriously believe that, Europe remaining with her arms folded, the Christian population will be a jot better—on the contrary, will they not be in a much worse condition than that which they now hold? On the other hand, strengthened by the position which we have undoubtedly given to Russia by our past conduct, that nation might be induced to act on the declaration made by the Emperor at Moscow. I for one would deeply deplore it—such a thing would be pregnant with inconvenience and danger. The remedy suggested that we alone should join with Russia in the work, though perhaps it might a little mitigate, would certainly go a very short way to diminish those dangers and inconveniences. But if we take another course, it would be this—I would take the principles laid down by not unimportant Members of the present Cabinet—the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the Home Secretary. The latter said—

“The time has now come when this country should refuse to be put off with paper currency.—They should demand to be paid in solid coin.”

And Sir Stafford Northcote said—

“I believe it to be impossible really to secure the peace of Europe unless we took steps to improve the administration of the provinces of Turkey. As long as you leave that door open—as long as you do nothing to remove the causes of these disturbances—any peace you may secure for the moment will be a hollow peace—no better than putting a piece of sticking-plaster upon a wound when there was festering matter beneath.”

I believe these are wise words. I am glad, my Lords, to think that the influence of the Government has been promoted by the Conference; and I believe that if that influence was exercised in persuading Europe as one body to come forward and insist—as they have the moral and the just right to do—that Turkey shall perform her promises, you would successfully deal with the danger which remains. It may be said you will not be able to persuade the other Powers of Europe. I am not quite sure that an impression does not prevail that England is not the only obstacle in the way of obtaining such an understanding. But even if it were not the case, would you be any worse after making the attempt than you are now? Another objection is that this means coercion. Logically it may mean coercion; but will anybody tell me that if once the Turks got into their heads the belief that not only England, but the whole of Europe, was absolutely in earnest in this matter, they would resist the united voice of Europe? I believe it would then be unnecessary to have recourse to coercion. I trust the last construction put will be the one we shall hear from the authorized Representatives of the Government. If they follow that course they will meet with great success—and I am sure it will be a success which will be welcomed by the great majority of this House, and by all classes of politicians, with unfeigned pleasure and approbation.

THE EARL OF DERBY: My Lords, I am bound to say that in the generally fair, moderate, and temperate speech of the noble Earl opposite there are some points in which I am compelled to differ from him; but there are also some in regard to which I entirely agree. I agree with the noble Earl in the well-deserved compliment he paid to the noble Lord who moved the Address. I also agree with him in the expression he gave to your Lordships' feelings with regard to the accession to this House of my noble Friend at the head of the Government. But, my Lords, there is one subject, and one subject alone, which so occupies and monopolizes public attention, that I feel I should be wasting your Lordships' time if I were to dwell on any of those minor and comparatively unimportant questions which are mentioned in the Speech from the Throne. It is the question of Eastern politics, and that question alone, that occupies the general attention; and it is one of such magnitude that I feel some difficulty in attempting to deal with it. And even after the speech of the noble Earl, to which I listened with the utmost attention, I find it difficult to ascertain what are the precise points in those long and complicated negotiations, which have lasted 18 months, to which he takes exception. Probably, when the Papers are in your Lordships' hands we shall be enlightened on that subject. I am able to say that these Papers will be presented this evening, and will be circulated, I hope, to-morrow; and though they are of a voluminous character, the noble Earl will agree with me that that is a necessary evil, and much better than that there should be the omission from them of any material circumstance. The charge against us on which the noble Earl chiefly dwelt, and of which we have heard a great deal out-of-doors, is that we have changed our policy. The noble Earl was just enough not to impute motives—

EARL GRANVILLE: I said I approved the change.

THE EARL OF DERBY: If the noble Earl says he approves our changed policy, that means that he condemns our former policy. My contention is that there is no room for such condemnation.

When a change of policy is spoken of, it may mean one of two things—it may mean that, the circumstances being the same, we have at different periods dealt with them in a different spirit—and to a change of that kind the reproach of inconsistency justly applies: or it may mean that, the circumstances becoming altogether different, we have modified our course of action in order to meet the altered condition of the case—and that, as I conceive, is no reproach at all. It is simply what every Government in every country always has done and always must do when dealing with international questions. If, therefore, the noble Earl means that, the circumstances being the same, we have pursued different policies, I say the imputation is unfounded; but if he only means that, the circumstances being different, we have in some degree altered our course of action to meet those altered conditions, that seems to me reasonable. Now, what was our course of action? Some 18 months ago, as the noble Earl has reminded us, we were extremely unwilling to take diplomatic action—that appears sufficiently from Papers already published. For my own part, I neither deny the fact, nor think it requires any apology. My Lords, at the risk of seeming to assert a paradox, I will repeat a statement I made as long ago as September, 1875,—namely, that the insurrection in Herzegovina was in the beginning a very unimportant affair, and that, with the most ordinary display of energy and skill on the part of the Porte, it might have been suppressed in a few weeks, and probably without any appreciable loss of life. The insurrection was encouraged by the sympathy which was extended to the insurgents from outside, by the almost incredible apathy of the Turkish authorities, and by the bankruptcy of the Turkish Empire. But in itself it was a small affair, and it appeared to us that there was a disposition in some quarters to give the matter a degree of diplomatic importance which it did not deserve. Then came the Andrassy Note. It did not originate with England; it was assented to by us, but not very readily; but we assented, for this reason among others, that the Porte itself preferred that we should take part in the intervention, since intervention was to take place. That Note was accepted by the Turkish Government. But, as your Lordships know, the insurgents had their own ideas of what they wanted, and they were not inclined to be pacified by the reforms promised. They went on fighting, and I do not recollect that at the time there was any great desire to press on them the acceptance of the conditions offered, though they had been pressed with so much eagerness on the Porte. Negotiations took place, with the result already known. Then came the Berlin Memorandum. We refused to join in that Memorandum; and I venture to say that our resolution not to join in it was thought right by all parties in England with insignificant exceptions. I explained last year our reasons for the course pursued. Setting aside questions of detail, we had two reasons for that conclusion, and time has thus far rather strengthened than weakened them. One was that the engagements imposed on the two parties respectively were one-sided and unequal. The Porte was to be bound, the insurgents were not. The other reason was—I did not mention it at the time, but I may without scruple mention it now—that, if we accepted the Memorandum, we should, as I conceive, have bound ourselves to concur in those “efficacious measures” by which diplomatic action was to be supported; and I think the experience we have since had excludes any reasonable doubt that what was meant was that we should join in a military occupation. To that policy we did not assent; it is a course we have always repudiated and rejected. We did not wish to stand aloof—we were quite ready to advise, to warn, if necessary to mediate; but from the first we have carefully guarded against the risk of being drawn to join in any armed coercion to be applied to the Porte, which probably might have involved us in a war inconsistent with our interests, and, as we believe, with justice. Later, when we went into the Conference we told all Europe at the outset—as I think it was our bounden duty to do—that we would not take upon ourselves to enforce its conclusions by force of arms, although we stated at the same time that, if the Porte refused to follow the advice which might be given, we should not hold ourselves bound to protect the Sultan against the consequences of his own acts. These are the views we held in the middle of last year. I know there is an idea in the public mind that at the time of the refusal of the Berlin Memorandum we were ready to go to war in behalf of Turkey, but that, an agitation springing up in consequence of the outrages committed in Bulgaria, we suddenly changed our course in deference to the feeling so shown. To that I will give a very simple and conclusive answer. In May last, just after the Berlin Memorandum had been rejected, and when the Fleet had been ordered into Besika Bay, I warned the Turkish Ambassador that times had changed since the Crimean War; that the state of things was no longer the same as it had been, and that the Porte would not act wisely in relying on more than the moral support of England in case of war. I think that is a sufficient answer to any charge that on the decisive question of peace or war we altered our policy in consequence of a change in public feeling. The noble Earl (Earl Granville) repeated to-night a remark which he made last year—that when we rejected the Berlin Memorandum we ought to have proposed some substitute for it. One answer to that remark I gave at the time. I told your Lordships that it seemed to me that the moment when we had refused a proposal strongly pressed upon us by all the Powers was not one when we could reasonably expect the Powers to listen favourably to our suggestions. But another reason, which I do not hesitate to give now, was that if, as we believed, the Berlin Memorandum was intended to lead to a policy of joint military occupation—that being a policy in which we could not agree—no plan was likely to be accepted by the Powers which did not lead to that result. My noble Friend (the Earl of Beaconsfield) made a speech at Aylesbury to which reference naturally has been made by the noble Earl this evening. My noble Friend was quite right in saying that negotiations—or I should rather prefer to call them discussions—with the Powers did not cease after the rejection of the Berlin Memorandum. It is quite true also, as I stated, that we had no proposal to make at that time; and I am not surprised that it should have been thought that there was some discrepancy between those statements. But the discrepancy is in appearance only. The fact is that I had no proposal to make because, after an almost daily communication with the Representatives of the various Powers, I had become satisfied that there was no immediate opening for any proposal of united action. Some scheme of the character of administrative autonomy was frequently discussed; but objections were taken to any such proposal, because on the part of one of the Powers, at least, it was believed that this administrative or local autonomy would shortly turn into complete autonomy. These differences were lessened, but not wholly removed, when the war with Serbia began, and the negotiations were interrupted. Well, what did we do? When the Serbian war broke out it did not require any great foresight to see that the insurgents would not long be enabled to resist the arms of Turkey, and that an attempt would be made to obtain the mediation of the Powers. We anticipated that application. Under the pressure of no agitation—for agitation at that time did not exist—we simply, as a thing in the interest of European peace, advised Her Majesty, in the Speech which closed the Session, to offer our good offices in the event of an appeal from Serbia. That happened which we anticipated. The request was made, and we complied with it. Then came a suspension of hostilities, followed by that long series of negotiations for the re-establishment of peace of which we have not yet seen the end. These negotiations I need not now recapitulate, partly because they are fully related in the Papers which will be laid before your Lordships, and partly because, up to the time immediately preceding the Conference, a statement of what had been done is already before the public. Parliament not being assembled and the interest on the subject being very great, I thought it desirable that there should be some authentic and public record of what occurred, and I accordingly directed a despatch addressed to Lord Augustus Loftus, and containing such a record to be published in the newspapers. Then came the Conference itself; and as to that, your Lordships and the public will have the fullest opportunity of knowing what occurred. I am glad to see that full justice has been done not only to the course taken by the Government in sending my noble Friend (the Marquess of Salisbury) upon his mission to Constantinople, but also to the exceeding ability with which he has discharged his arduous labours. But notwithstanding the ability thus shown by my noble Friend, I have heard it said—it was said only the other day by a very eminent, but certainly not a very dispassionate critic of those affairs—that the Conference had been a woeful and signal failure. Well, before coming to the conclusion that the Conference has been a failure, you must first consider what were the objects we had in view in assisting at a Conference. Of course, if you look upon it in the light that all Europe united to press upon the Porte the one particular scheme of reform on which the Conference insisted, and that that scheme of reform was rejected; if you regard that scheme as an end in itself, there has been a failure to accomplish it. But I say, and I am quite sure that my noble Friend (the Marquess of Salisbury) would also say that the immediate plan brought before the Conference was not in itself an end, it was only a means to an end. The object we had in view was two-fold—first and mainly, the preservation of European peace; and, next, such an amelioration of the internal administration of the Christian Provinces of Turkey as would secure Europe from a return of the disturbance and anxiety experienced during the last two years. Now, having in mind these objects, it does seem a little premature to say that the Conference has failed in bringing about either of these two results. Of the prospects of European peace I am bound to speak with reserve. Practically, the decision rests with a single Power—almost with a single man; and a graver responsibility than that which at present rests on the head of the Russian Empire never perhaps devolved upon any human being. But I will say this—that if peace is desired—and I sincerely hope and believe that it is—the Conference has done much in various ways to prepare and to smooth the way for peace. In the first place, it has gained time. That may be thought a small matter; but in diplomacy it is often anything but a small matter. The state of opinion which exists in Russia is now, so far as we can ascertain, very far removed from that which existed a few months ago. Then report told us of general excitement, of general ardour and enthusiasm for a new crusade. Now the re-action has come, and I am assured that among influential persons in Russia there is a growing disposition to consider calmly and coolly the chances and risks of war, and not rush into them hastily. My Lords, taking all these circumstances into consideration, if nothing else had been gained by the Conference than the interposition of two or three months before the course of the Russian Government had to be decided, I should say that, even from that point of view, the labours of my noble Friend and of his Colleagues would not be thrown away. But that is not the most important part of the work which the Conference has done. It has enabled us to know more clearly than we knew before what it is that Russia asks—or, rather, perhaps I ought to say, what Russia will be prepared to accept. We know, on the other hand, what the Porte is willing to concede. I do not lay much stress, any more than the noble Earl opposite, upon the new Constitution of the Porte; but, before pronouncing an opinion upon it, I should wish to see whether it is fairly and honestly put into practice, and if it is so put in practice, how it works. Before the Conference was held we knew there were certain things which the Porte was willing to entertain, and that there were certain other things which the Porte would resist. Thanks mainly to the energy and decision of my noble Friend, the original Russian programme, which there was no hope of the Porte accepting, has been cut down in material points. The question is now between that which can be peaceably obtained from the Porte and that which has been ineffectually asked from the Porte; and Europe will have to consider whether the difference between the two is so wide as to give any reasonable cause for war. But there is another point in connection with the Conference to which I must call attention. The Conference has put an end to a state of things which had become full of danger. The Servian war, as we all know, had become in fact, though not in form, a Russian war. Russian Volunteers constituted the whole fighting strength of the Servian army. A Servian defeat was therefore a Russian defeat, and was felt as such in Russia. A very little more of the exasperation which that campaign produced in Russia and it would have been difficult, if not practically impossible, for the Emperor to keep a Russian Army out of the field. Well, that state of things has passed away. The Russian Volunteers have gone home—not in the most affectionate disposition towards their Servian allies. The Servians are not in the least disposed to call them back; and the question is not now ostensibly one in which Russia is on one side and Turkey on the other. Russia is only one of six Powers which have taken a common part in the discussions of the Conference. The Emperor may therefore perfectly well say to his subjects that he sees no reason why he, single handed, should take on himself to resent a slight which was equally sustained by all Europe, or to enforce views which were equally those of every other European Power. What the result may be no man can foretell; but I am sure of this, that the Conference has left us in a far better position as regards the prospects of peace than that in which it found us. Then as to the other object for which the Conference met—the improvement of the internal administration of the disturbed Provinces of Turkey. The objection taken by the Porte to the proposals of the Powers was almost entirely an objection, not to the reforms proposed, but to the guarantees demanded for their execution. The Porte refused these guarantees as being dangerous to its independence. I think, for my own part, that in that respect the Porte was wrong, and that it would have been better for the Porte to do as we have often known individuals in embarrassed pecuniary circumstances do—that it would have been very much wiser that he should put his affairs into the hands of trustees and submit to conditions which might for the moment have been disagreeable, but which would have been a security against war, and which, having answered their purpose, might no doubt have been relaxed after a time, when further evidence had been given of the sincerity with which they had been accepted. But the Porte has taken on itself the responsibility of working out its own reforms in its own way. I will not venture to predict the issue; but I believe that at Constantinople the gravity of the situation is understood; that there is a sincere desire to avoid anything that can give ground of a quarrel to any European Power; and that the Ministers of the Sultan see, as we do, that the best security against any such quarrel lies in adopting on their own initiative the substance at least—though it may be in a different form—of the proposals of the Conference. There is nothing to prevent their doing that if they please; and if they do, the credit of their action will be fairly due to the Conference, since without that the action would probably not have been taken. We, as I conceive, have a plain course before us. We have said from the first that though we would press on the Porte the recommendations of the Conference, we could not use, or sanction the use of, force, though at the same time we could not undertake to protect the Turkish Empire from force used by other Powers. That, as I have already said, was our language as long ago as May last. We have never varied from it, and I think it places us in a plain and intelligible position. I am not anxious to dwell upon an argument of which we shall probably hear a good deal in the next few weeks—as to whether the internal defects of Turkish administration can operate as a release to us from the Treaties of 1856. I do not think the argument a sound one, for two reasons—first, because when we made those Treaties, whatever their force may be, we did so, not on account of any disinterested affection for Turkey, but on account of the European interests involved; and next because the Treaty of Paris, dating from 1856, was formally renewed in 1871, and it can hardly be said by noble Lords opposite that to renew that Treaty in 1871 was a mistake, since they themselves did it, or that the character of Turkish administration has changed so much in the last six years that what was a duty then is an offence now. I think, therefore, that the whole question, looked at in that light, is rather pedantic than practical. Obviously a Treaty can only be held to apply to circumstances analogous to those in which it was made; and if a Power which you are bound by Treaty to protect declines your advice and acts in a different sense, you cannot be pledged to support that Power for an indefinite time against the possible consequences of its own action. This is not the time to go into an argument as to the wording of our Treaty engagements, and it is therefore only in passing that I remind your Lordships of the precise nature of the two Treaties into which we entered in 1856. The first is the Treaty of Peace, bearing date March 30, 1856, by which we undertake to "respect the independence and the territorial integrity of the Ottoman Empire; guarantee in common the strict observance of that engagement; and will in consequence consider any act tending to its violation as a question of general interest." Now mark, my Lords, the words of that Treaty, for they are important. We undertake to respect the integrity and independence of the Ottoman Empire. That is easy enough for us, who certainly have no designs against Turkey. We guarantee in common the strict observance of that engagement—that is, we each undertake to observe it, and to do what we can to make others observe it; but there is no shadow of a promise in that Treaty to make non-observance by other Powers a casus belli. The words stop short of that; they carefully avoid any such pledge—in fact, they point directly to a different course of action—namely, to collective discussion and negotiation. As far as that Treaty is concerned, therefore, we are in no sense bound by a promise to fight for Turkey. And that we are not so bound is the more clear from the fact of this Treaty having been supplemented by another, which would have been superfluous if the first Treaty had imposed the obligation in question. The second Treaty is that entered into between England, France, and Austria, which is undoubtedly of a more binding character, since it pledges each of the Powers to regard any infraction of the former Treaty as a casus belli, and, on the invitation of the others, to concert measures with the Porte. But that is not an engagement entered into with the Porte. It is not an engagement to which the Porte is a party. It does not, therefore, bind us in any way except to France and to Austria; and, unless France and Austria call upon us to interfere—a step which, in existing circumstances, they are not in the least likely to take—it binds us to nothing at all. I think it well to give that brief explanation, because I have seen a good deal of confusion and misunderstanding on the subject. While I say what I have said about Treaty obligations I wish to guard myself in one respect. I am only contending for the freedom of England to act or not to act as she may think fit. I am not contending that under all possible circumstances—such, for instance, as that of Constantinople being threatened—inaction would be our duty. That is a question on which it would be quite unnecessary and wholly unwise to pledge ourselves now. But I wish to point out that in the language which we held in May last, and which we have held throughout, we were not departing from the engagements into which the country has entered, but simply declining to give them a construction more stringent than they will fairly bear. The noble Earl opposite (Earl Granville) adverted—and I do not quarrel with him for doing so—to the speech delivered at Guildhall by my noble Friend the First Lord of the Treasury. He asked why my noble Friend delivered that speech when he had the pacific assurances of the Emperor of Russia in his hand. It is, of course, a very difficult thing to describe the general tenour of a speech, because this cannot be done unless you read it through and comment upon it line by line. I must say, however, that I do not regard my noble Friend's speech as being in any sense a challenge or a menace. It was not so regarded at the time of its delivery, and I do not think that character would ever have been ascribed to it but for the accident of the Moscow declaration of the Emperor following a few days later. Everybody took that declaration as a reply to the Guildhall speech, and people said, not unnaturally, that it was a matter of regret that the provocation to utter it had been given. But we have the best means of knowing that the speech was not a reply, and that the Emperor of Russia had no knowledge when he delivered it of what had been said at Guildhall. The coincidence in time was merely accidental. Again, with regard to the pacific assurances of the Emperor of Russia—although I do not doubt his personal sincerity, it must be remembered that even an Emperor of Russia is not all-powerful. Events may be too strong for him. His hand may be forced, and he may be compelled by public opinion, or feeling, in his own country to do that which he may not personally wish to do. Therefore, while accepting his pacific declarations as sincere, I decline to accept them as a sufficient guarantee against war. I now, my Lords, pass to another subject. The noble Earl opposite (Earl Granville) referred to the despatch which I wrote after the occurrence of the Bulgarian massacres, and I think he asked me how I could reconcile the language held in that despatch with any theory of the independence of Turkey? If I mistake not, I could recall instances in which language quite as peremptory has been used towards Powers which were confessedly independent; but if the noble Earl wishes to know by what right I used the language which I did, I would tell him that we used no menace, and threatened no coercion; but that the position in which we were placed in regard to the Porte was one which was altogether peculiar. We were engaged in the work of mediation on behalf of Turkey as well as the other belligerents; we were trying to put an end to the war between them; and in the capacity of mediators we had, I contend, the same right to hold the language which I held that a counsel has to tell his client—"If you do so and so I shall throw up my brief." There is no threat from beginning to end of all that I have written on the subject, except the threat of withdrawing our moral support. We used no menace. We simply said that if certain things were not done the Porte would forfeit our moral support as well as that of Europe. And, surely, it is no violation of the independence either of a nation or of an individual to say—"If you persist in putting yourself in the wrong, I shall wash my hands of your affairs." On the general question as to what precise extent we were justified in exercising intervention in favour of the Christian subjects of Turkey, I do not think that I ever, to the best of my recollection, either in this House, or elsewhere, used language to the effect that such intervention was forbidden by treaty. What I believe I have said was a very different thing—namely, that I did not conceive we had a Treaty right to do so under the Treaty of 1856. But as for the general moral obligations imposed upon us by our relations with the Turkish Empire, I never, to the best of my knowledge, used any language denying or disputing the reality of those obligations. What I have affirmed, and what I now repeat, is this—that interference in the internal affairs of a foreign country is one of those remedies which ought to be used only very rarely, and never without real necessity. You cannot have a worse Government for any country than one composed of a committee of foreign Representatives which should undertake to regulate its action. They, in the first place, would not be likely long to pull together; in the next place, their acquaintance with the affairs of the country would be naturally very limited; and, above all, they would be altogether irresponsible. These are, I believe, all the remarks with which I need trouble your Lordships at present. The noble Earl opposite asked whether there was any further information with regard to the Bulgarian massacres to be produced. The Papers which have been laid on the Table will, I think, give the latest reports in connection with that subject. For the rest, I am quite aware that the discussion of this evening is only the beginning of many discussions which will probably be held on this question. We have done our utmost for the maintenance of peace. We believe we have done all that at the time was possible. If we have succeeded in preserving the peace of Europe, we shall be amply rewarded for the many anxieties of the past year. If we fail—and, of course, it is possible we may fail—we shall not be discouraged, and we shall continue to use such exertions as may be in our power to abridge and to lessen a calamity which we may not have been successful in wholly averting. In any case, we put what we have said and done fully before the public, and we shall appeal with confidence to the country and to Parliament.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL: As I took some part in the agitation to which the noble Lord opposite referred at the commencement of the evening, I trust your Lordships will allow me to say a few words in reply. The reference was made in a speech of very great ability; but, sharing as I do fully in the feelings which have been expressed by my noble Friend behind me with regard to the accession to this House of the noble Earl opposite (the Earl of Beaconsfield), I certainly shall not comment in a tone of anything like asperity on what has recently fallen from him—for as a general rule the language he holds towards his opponents is not only full of humour, but full of good humour. I, however, regret the more on that account that he should, during the past autumn, have spoken in terms of such extreme harshness of those who took part in the agitation to which he alluded. I will attribute it to momentary irritation. I do not, at the same time, consider this a fitting opportunity for that full and ample discussion by which only that agitation could be completely explained and defended. I shall, therefore, wait until the Papers are laid on the Table of your Lordships' House, and shall then take the opportunity of stating fully to the House the grounds on which I deemed myself to be justified in taking part in that agitation. I am sure no Member of this House—no Peer, no Englishman—would wish to call in question the right of public speaking—it is one of the dearest rights as well of Englishmen as of Scotchmen and Irishmen. But this I will confess frankly—that, in my opinion, public meetings in general ought not to interfere with the foreign policy of the country, which is for the most part concerned with matters of extreme delicacy and much difficulty, embracing nuances and shades which it is almost impossible to make plain to a public assembly. I therefore admit that there ought not to be such interference as that of which I am speaking, except in extreme cases; and unless I make out such a case when the subject comes before your Lordships, I will submit to any censure which your Lordships may pronounce. I wish, in the next place, to refer very briefly to the speech which we have just heard from the noble Earl the Secretary for Foreign Affairs. I am free to say that that speech has disabused us on this side of the House of an impression which was created by the language, not officially reported, but which is supposed to have been held by the noble Marquess who was the special Envoy of this country at Constantinople; and, having mentioned him, I hope I may be allowed to add my humble tribute of respect and admiration for the acceptance by him of the mission which took him to Turkey. I believe no purer act of patriotism or of public duty has ever been performed. He undertook a task from which he had nothing to gain, while he submitted, in going to Constantinople, his reputation to some risk. That reputation, however, has certainly not been sullied, and I know no case, although Party spirit is a thing of which I have had considerable experience during my public life, in which all Parties so eagerly united to hail an appointment as in that of the noble Marquess, and to lend him their support. No man, I may add, hailed more gladly than I did his appointment, or felt more confident that he would uphold the honour and interests of England. My Lords, I now return to the speech of the noble Earl the Secretary for Foreign Affairs, who denies that there has been any change in the policy of the Government with respect to this Eastern Question. I wish to point out to the House what I look upon as an entire change of policy. Up to the date of the 12th of August and from the close of last Session of Parliament the public in this country had no right to suppose, and no reason that Government were shaken in the policy which they had pursued up to that time—the policy of absolute non-intervention in the internal affairs of Turkey—not only non-intervention as regards ourselves, but remonstrance with, and resistance to, all the other Powers of Europe for mixing themselves up in those affairs. The noble Earl, after the famous Berlin Note, in writing to Sir Henry Elliot, distinctly says that it was the policy of the Government to avoid and prevent all interference of the States of Europe in the internal affairs of Turkey. There can be no doubt about that, he repeats it over and over again; and up to the time of the public meetings held in the autumn this was believed to be the fixed policy of the Government. On the 11th of September, however, as reported in The Times of the 12th, a deputation of Conservative working men waited on the noble Earl and addressed to him a remonstrance with regard to the affairs of Turkey. I will read to the House the words which the noble Earl used in reply, as reported in The Times. He said—

“So far as those unfortunate Bulgarians who have suffered so much are concerned, they have a right, no doubt, to such reparation as it is now possible to make, and they have a right also, no doubt to the signal, conspicuous, and exemplary punishment of those who have been the offenders. I think they have also a right that in some manner or another we shall take such steps as may secure them from a recurrence of similar abuses for the future."

My Lords, I say that that was an absolute change of policy—as sudden and complete as if there had been a change of Government. The noble Earl followed up what he said on that occasion by a speech addressed to another deputation, headed by the Lord Mayor of London. That was succeeded by the well-known despatch of the 21st September, in which the noble Earl made the gravest demands on the Turkish Government for the punishment of the offenders and the better security and good government of the Christian subjects of the Porte. These were obligations which the Government considered they had come under in consequence of the Bulgarian atrocities. My noble Friend (Earl Granville) was therefore justified in saying that there was a sudden and complete change of policy, but a change involving no disgrace or discredit whatever upon the Government; and if that language had been held throughout, no censure could be passed upon the Government on that account. With regard to the speech of the noble Earl, the Secretary of State to-night, I regret that I interpret it in another way—as a step backwards, and a very distinct step backwards from these public engagements. In the first place I deplored to hear from the noble Earl a reiterated and distinct statement of his regret that the Turkish Government had not succeeded in repressing the insurrection in Herzegovina and Bosnia. I admit that it is legitimate to regret that a friendly Government has not been able to suppress an insurrection, but on one ground—that you can lay your hand on your heart and say that it is a Government which you ought to support, and which treats its subjects with such tolerable fairness that you can wish it to secure its power over them. Is this the case? Can you lay your hand on your heart and say that this is a Government you ought to sympathize with, and not with the insurrection? I say distinctly in this "high place"—in this "house top" of Europe, that every insurrection against that Government is a legitimate insurrection. Human beings under that Government owe it no allegiance. I heard that declaration of the noble Earl with infinite regret, and it is not one that will satisfy the feelings and consciences of the people of this country. I heard also with infinite regret the declaration of the noble Earl that he was determined in no case to use force to compel the Turks to do justice to their Christian subjects. I do not know whether the noble Earl has already made that announcement to Europe, but if so you might as well not have sent an Envoy to Constantinople. The noble Lord who moved the Address denounced what you have called the "bag and baggage" policy; but I think that is the very policy pursued towards the noble Marquess himself. The noble Lord objected to this idea, because, he said, if the Turks were sent out of Europe they would go somewhere else where they would do equal mischief. I am glad that if the noble Marquess was sent from Constantinople he has come back to us, and I hope his influence in the Government will be in favour of the oppressed subjects of the Porte—as it is reported and believed to have been at the Conference. The noble Earl the Secretary of State has told us that the object of the Conference was two-fold—to secure peace to Europe and good government to the subjects of Turkey. Have you secured good government, or even a tolerable prospect of it? That is what the people of England desire to know. You proposed certain terms for the good government of Turkey, and these terms have been refused. Have you got any others? Have you secured peace? The noble Earl declared that peace depends upon one man, and yet two sentences afterwards he declared he did not think that peace depended on the Emperor of Russia. Which is true? The declaration shows the fundamental error in the policy of the noble Earl. He does not appreciate—he has never appreciated—the forces at work in this question. Do you think this great Eastern Question, which has been brooding over Europe, and which has darkly overshadowed it for 40 or 50 years—do you think that this question which has been forced upon you, reluctant as you have been to see its gravity—do you mean to tell the House of Lords that this question depends upon the action of one man, and that man the Emperor of Russia? And then you profess the next moment to believe that the Emperor of Russia is perfectly sin-

care. I say you will have no peace in Europe, and you ought to have no peace in Europe, until the well-being of the Christian subjects of the Porte has been secured by the united action of the European Powers. And if you have sent one of your most distinguished Members to Constantinople, declaring beforehand your guns to be loaded with blank cartridge, I say you might just as well have sat still, twiddling your thumbs, as you did for three months before. The noble Earl says that the Conference has not failed, and that we have obtained by it securities for the better treatment of the Christian subjects of the Porte. But the securities have been cut down and brought to such a minimum that no human being will think them worth fighting for. That may be one way of securing peace; but will the Christian population of Turkey be restrained from fighting for something better than you have given them—does he think that the demands that will be made will never exceed this irreducible minimum? Has the noble Earl never heard of the Sibylline leaves? Do you think that the great forces of religion and the sympathies of people with people, which are at the root of this great Eastern Question, will be satisfied with this irreducible minimum to which the claims of the Christians have been cut down, and to which the noble Marquess seems to have consented? If the noble Earl does not believe that, the Conference has failed, both in securing peace and good government for Turkey. The Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs says that our plain course is to do nothing—to let things drift. The noble Lord who moved the Address said it was very wrong to speak to the man at the helm. There is no man at the helm. You tell us yourselves that you will do nothing—and that you will let the vessel drift on. But you know that there are other powers in Europe besides the noble Earl the Secretary for Foreign Affairs, and much as he may despise sentimentality in politics—forgetting that sentiment rules the world—forgetting that all moral feeling is founded on sentiment—much as he may despise sentimentality in politics, I am greatly mistaken if sentimentality will not be too strong for him if some one does not seize the helm which the noble Earl says the Government has abandoned. I believe that Europe will drift into a bloody and dreadful war. I am not one of those who deprecate war under all circumstances, or who think that peace under all circumstances is the object that ought to be secured by a Christian people. There are causes that are worth fighting for. There are people who desire “peace at any price,” but it is a price to be paid by others and not by themselves. “Anything for a quiet life;” but the quietness of life is to be for themselves and not for others. That is a feeling of utter selfishness, and, my Lords, my belief is that this policy will end in war. Let Her Majesty's Government take the European concert in time, so that the European Powers may act together. You have been ever reluctant to take part in this united action; you refused to join with Austria in the Andrassy Note; you were the drag upon Europe; you kept it from acting together for six or eight months. It may be too late now; but, if you have the chance of preserving peace, or of limiting war to one locality or for any definite purpose, for Heaven's sake re-establish your European concord, and do not be so foolish and so weak as to say, “We shall never fight; we shall never force our will on the Turks.” This course is one of utter fatuity; and my sincere belief is that sooner or later such a policy will end in a disastrous war.

THE EARL OF BEACONSFIELD: My Lords, the noble Duke who has just addressed us told us that he would reserve his opinion on what he styles this great Eastern Question which darkens Europe until he had read the Papers. What may be his effusion after that function has been fulfilled, with my little experience of this House I pretend not to predict; but I doubt whether he will be able, on that occasion, to show more fiery heat than he has upon the present. The noble Duke has charged us with laying it down as a principle that in no circumstances could we advise coercion to be used towards Turkey. I listened in vain to my noble Friend (the Earl of Derby) if he gave expression to so unqualified a dogma. What I understood my noble Friend to say—and I apprehend there are few acquainted with the circumstances of the case who would not agree with him—was this—that coercion was not the policy of this country in reference to the Christian population of Turkey; and my own opinion is that if we had had recourse to coercion, or if coercion had even been threatened, these massacres which we so much deplore would have been extended and aggravated. I should like to collect from the noble Duke on the subject of this great Eastern Question, the shadow of which is brooding over Europe, what he believes to be the elements of that Question. The noble Duke has treated it entirely as if it referred to the condition of the Christian subjects of the Porte. I believe there is a general anxiety among all parties in this country, and, indeed, on the part of most European Governments, to secure the amelioration of the Christian subjects of the Porte. The noble Duke says that that is a matter which we entirely discard; but surely this is not a just description of the policy of the Government. We commenced by giving our adhesion to the Andrassy Note, which certainly involved a great interference with the condition of the Christian subjects of the Porte. In my opinion, if it had been introduced more favourably to the notice and consideration of Europe, and if it had been worked out in detail, it contained practical propositions, which, in quiet times, were susceptible of effecting, for that population most of the results that were desired. Am I to understand from the noble Duke that in his mind the only element of this great Eastern Question is the condition of the Christian subjects of the Porte? I am sure that he, a statesman who has had to do with public affairs, could hardly attempt to enforce a proposition so fundamentally weak. Surely, when the noble Duke calls upon us to join with the other Powers of Europe to form a compact body in order that we may effect the object he desires, he cannot have forgotten that the assembled Powers of Europe, when they have to consider this great Eastern Question, have to consider something else besides the mere amelioration of the condition of the Christian subjects of the Porte. Surely some of the elements of the distribution of power in the world are involved in it. It is a question in which is involved the existence of Empires; and really it does appear to me we shall never come to its solution—which probably may happen in the lives of some whom I am now adressing, though not in my own—if we are to discard from it every political consideration, and to believe that the only element with which we have to deal is the amelioration of the condition of the Christian subjects of the Porte. To my mind it is quite clear that if the Powers of Europe work in that direction only, and work, as they probably would if they worked in that direction only without the energy necessary, their interference would only aggravate the condition of the Christian subjects of the Porte and bring about those very calamities of which we have had such recent and such bitter experience. If this matter is really to be treated it must be treated by statesmen; we must accurately know who are to be responsible hereafter for the condition of this population; we must know what changes in the distribution of territory in the most important part of the globe are to be made as the consequence of this attempted solution; and it is only by considerations of that kind—it is only by bringing our minds, free from all passion, to a calm and sagacious consideration of this subject, and viewing it as statesmen, that we can secure the great interests of this country, which are too often forgotten in declamatory views of circumstances with which we have to deal practically—it is in this way only we can secure an amelioration in the condition of the population of the Ottoman Empire. I trouble your Lordships to-night with much reluctance; I would rather have listened to the debate than have taken part in it. However, I could not but enter my protest against the view and speech of the noble Duke upon this question; and I reserve to myself to meet him on the occasion of which he has given Notice, when I shall be happy not only to hear his views, but humbly and with due modesty to offer my own.

VISCOUNT CARDWELL: My Lords, I do not intend to enter at large into this discussion now, but one remark, I think, is due to my noble Friend, the noble Duke behind me. He did not limit his view to the case of the Christians alone. His argument applied to the whole question, and was that the conduct of the Government in all the earlier stages of it had been a course of mischievous inaction. Have you refuted this argument? You (the Government) admit that you have accompanied all the efforts you have made for the purpose of carrying out your policy by the dangerous statement that you would not attempt to enforce it. Proposals made by Governments with the statement that they will in no case be backed up by force are really worthless, and had better not have been made at all. When you acceded to the proposal for a Consular Commission, you stated that you did it in deference to the wish of the Turkish Government, and you let it be understood there would be no penalty if that Government did not meet the views of the Commission. If that Consular Commission had been backed up by our representation to the Turkish Government that it was of importance our policy should be carried out, in all probability the Commission would not have been ineffectual. Although the Andrassy Note came from the Government of Austria, which was least likely to propose hostile interference, you gave it, as you stated at the time, a reluctant and hesitating adhesion, and you caused it to be clearly understood at Constantinople that no evil consequences would follow if the Turkish Government treated its proposals with neglect. I own I am astonished to hear the noble Earl say that we were parties to the Andrassy Note, when the Correspondence makes it so clear that, though this was the proposal of United Europe, we declined to be parties to it, and that it was only because Turkey wished us that we eventually became parties to the Note. It was upon a declaration made by you to that effect that the Andrassy Note was treated by Turkey with indifference. Count Andrassy told us that unless there was united action on the part of the Powers for the purpose of effecting improvements in the provinces of Turkey, Servia and Montenegro would go to war, and Bulgaria in all probability would be drawn in. You neglected that, however; you practically refused to join Austria on that request; and your verbal adhesion was almost worse than not joining at all, for it gave assurance to Turkey that she might disregard the united Powers. You were entreated by every Power in Europe to join in the Berlin Memorandum, and you refused; you took to yourselves great credit for refusing, and for securing the co-operation of Europe in a policy of non-interference. These were the arguments of the noble Duke (the Duke of Argyll), who has been entirely misunderstood by the noble Earl the Prime Minister, and whose argument was a just reply to that of the noble Earl the Foreign Secretary. I acknowledge the gravity of the question; and having no desire to anticipate the Papers which are about to be presented, I reserve my arguments until this information is fully before us.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: My Lords, I must commence the few observations I have to make with the commonplace protest that I do not intend to enter on this question until the Papers relating to it are before the House. When they are, I think the noble Duke opposite (the Duke of Argyll) will not find that they support his doubts as to whether my own action at the Conference expressed the views of my noble Friend behind me (the Earl of Derby). He will there find that the words there used, whatever they were, were fully authorized by the Cabinet. But I rise rather to protest against the view laid down as to the duty of the Government with respect to coercion—namely, that we ought to adopt a course which in times past has been too popular with Governments of the colour of the noble Duke opposite, and use threats of coercion while we are hazy in our own minds as to whether we shall follow them up or not. Now, whatever other opinions may be formed on this subject, I must lay this down with some confidence—that any threat or intimation of a threat of coercion should never be made by the British Government until it is absolutely prepared to follow up the menace. It is very easy to talk of threatening coercion against the Turkish Government; but have you picked the idea to pieces in your own mind what you mean by coercion? I know it means that your fleet may sail up the Bosphorus and threaten Stamboul. But, suppose Turkey refuses, you can do nothing more. I do not suppose that military coercion, considering the extent of the Turkish Empire, would be a course which military strategists would recommend—a naval coercion would naturally be adopted. But suppose Turkey refuses, and you proceed to the ultima ratio—you might indeed dethrone the Ottoman dynasty—that would be the signal for confusion and anarchy in every part of the Empire. You announce to all the Mahomedan population that the dynasty to which they have for hundreds of years been attached, and to which they are attached still, has been struck down by a Christian Power in the cause of Christians. You make this declaration to a mixed population of Mahomedans and Christians—and the Mahomedan population being armed and the Christian population being still unarmed, what would be the result but a most frightful exaggeration of those terrible scenes of which we have heard so much as occurring in Bulgaria? The policy of coercion is, with respect to any country as regards its internal affairs, one of the gravest and most responsible policies which a Government can adopt. It used to be somewhat in fashion—we have tried it in past times; but I doubt if we have ever tried it with effect and benefit to those whose condition we desired to ameliorate. In more recent times we have sometimes threatened coercion without carrying it out; but I do not think that on these occasions we have been really kind and beneficent towards those in whom we were interested. I do not desire to make any pledges for the future. In the speech of my noble Friend the Foreign Minister there was no language pledging the Government as to the future. He stated what our policy had been in the past. He stated that he thought intervention, as a rule, was exceedingly dangerous. He stated that the grounds of it depended on considerations of high expediency, and that he would not pledge himself that there was no contingency in which inaction would cease to be our duty. I think he went as far as it is the duty of a Foreign Minister to go. It is not the duty of any Foreign Minister to announce contingent policies in this House. But I must demur to the inference that because he has not threatened coercion, and because he has not intimated what he should do in certain contingencies, that there is any want of friendliness on our part or of interest in the lot of the deeply suffering subjects of the Porte. I feel sure when my noble Friend the noble Duke reads the Papers he will be convinced that our feelings, though they may not, perhaps, be expressed with so much eloquence, are not less earnest—are not less vivid—than of those who criticise our proceedings. In the same spirit I entirely demur to the criticism passed by my two noble Friends opposite upon what fell from my noble Friend the Secretary of State with respect to the insurrection in the Herzegovina. My noble Friend expressed a wish that that insurrection had been speedily suppressed, and that has been treated as language approving of cruelty. Has the noble Earl rightly considered all the sufferings that followed, the terrible dangers that then existed, and the uncertainty that still hangs over the fate of those engaged in it? I deny the doctrine that has been laid down that insurrection, even under a much worse government than that of the Porte, is always legitimate. I should prefer to lay down the doctrine that insurrection is only legitimate even under a very bad government when it has a fair prospect of success. My noble Friend measured the future, he knew the trials and the miseries that were in store for them—he was well convinced—and the event has proved that he was right—that there would follow insurrection sufferings far greater than those they, the Christians, had already endured; and he wished that relief might come through the slow process of negotiation rather than through the dangers of a bloody insurrection; and after all the events that have so deeply moved our people I think my noble Friend has shown that he was wise and sagacious in saying that the insurrection should not be allowed to continue. My Lords, I feel that we are under a great disadvantage in attempting to prolong any such discussion as this in the absence of the Papers relating to the subject. It has only been necessary for me to speak because I observed in the speeches of the noble Lords opposite an attempt to attach to the opinions we entertain and the policy we have pursued a want of sympathy with the Christian populations which have so deeply suffered. I desire to repudiate that imputation in the most distinct and emphatic manner, and to say that their interests have never been absent from our minds; but we have also had present to our minds the danger that hasty and unwise action might produce to those whom we designed to benefit. We entertained the hope, and still entertain it, that by slower and more peaceful means all our objects may be accomplished.

LORD WAVENEY, who was very indistinctly heard, was understood to say that by the rule which Turkey had herself adopted in the face of Europe, Turkey should be judged. As she had rejected European counsels, from European counsels let her be excluded henceforth. He did not desire to see the population of Constantinople or other places suffering from the course which the Government had adopted; but he did say that the Government and the people should be placed in such a position as would show that Europe was in earnest. He did not agree with the noble Marquess (the Marquess of Salisbury) that our fleet was the only means of coercing Turkey that we possessed. It was quite possible to separate the Turkish capital from the main sources of its supplies and resources. The fleet that had lain in Besika Bay would be strong enough to bar the entrance to the Dardanelles. Let the population of Constantinople be made to derive its daily food from the provinces of the interior, and the Turkish Government would be speedily aroused to the perception that should necessity arise we had other means of coercion than the employment of absolute force. The Christian element was the first and the most important in this question, because it was the persecution and the oppression to which the Christians in Turkey were subjected that constituted the cause of disquiet and trouble to Europe; and that disquiet and that trouble should no longer be allowed to exist. He still thought it right to protest against the assertion which had been made that there was only one way of coercing Turkey. He believed that the employment of the legitimate power of England would be found available and sufficient for all such purposes as were necessary; and available and sufficient, above all things, for proving to the Porte that there was a real and substantial power in this country.

THE QUEEN'S SPEECH FROM THE THRONE.

MR. SPEAKER reported, That this House has, this day, attended Her Majesty in the House of Peers, when Her Majesty was pleased to make, by Her Chancellor, a most gracious Speech from the Throne to both Houses of Parliament; of which, Mr. Speaker said, he had, for greater accuracy, obtained a Copy:—

And Mr. SPEAKER read it to the House.

ADDRESS IN ANSWER TO HER MAJESTY'S MOST GRACIOUS SPEECH.

VISCOUNT GALWAY, in rising to move that an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, in answer to Her Majesty's Most Gracious Speech from the Throne, said, that, difficult as was the position of previous speakers who had to perform this duty, the interest which attached to it that day very much increased that difficulty, and he therefore asked the House for that indulgence which it so generously extended to its Members. It was a matter of great congratulation to all that Her Majesty had been able again to open Parliament. Her Most Gracious Majesty's Speech, which had just been read, commenced by referring to a subject not only of great importance to this country, but to the whole of Europe. With the permission of the House he should like to read a short extract from the Speech at the prorogation last year, because he believed this would materially aid them in considering the events which had occurred since then. After referring to the differences then existing between the Porte and its Christian subjects in the Herzegovina Her Majesty said—

"Should a favourable opportunity present itself, I shall be ready, in concert with My Allies, to offer My good offices for the purpose of mediation between the contending parties; bearing in mind alike the duties imposed upon Me by Treaty obligations and those which arise from considerations of humanity and policy."

That, he believed, was the spirit which influenced Her Majesty's Government during the whole of the past six months, and that policy they had endeavoured faithfully to carry out. He should like now to refer as briefly as possible to one or two of the events which had occurred since that time. At the end of August Servia applied for the mediation of England, and in accordance with that wish the British Government proposed to the Porte an armistice. After some delay hostilities were suspended, and the British Government proposed some basis of pacification. The Porte, as matters were still unsettled, proposed a further suspension of hostilities; but Servia—whether from foreign advice or from an erroneous view as to the feelings of this country, it would not become him to discuss—refused that offer. Soon after there was a proposition for the occupation by a foreign Power of Bulgaria, but it was not found to be acceptable either, he believed, to this or other countries. Various negotiations followed, and at length, at the beginning of November, an armistice of six weeks was agreed upon and a Conference arranged to be held. That Conference was not in contravention or contradiction of any of the provisions of the Treaty of Paris. There was a precedent in the case of the Lebanon. The Conference had, he believed, been productive of very great good, notwithstanding the manner in which it had terminated. It was, in fact, no small gain that the leading Powers of Europe should have met and discussed matters of so much importance to themselves. The result must, undoubtedly, be a better understanding between them; and the Conference might be said also to have cleared up some erroneous and, perhaps, extravagant views as to the possibility of an immediate and instantaneous pacification of those Provinces. It had shown the folly of talking of driving a whole nation out of Europe. That was an achievement not very easy of accomplishment, even if it were desirable. It had also shown that the working out of autonomy for different Provinces would be attended with very great difficulty. Even if the small States in question had in themselves sufficient powers of self-government, it was questionable whether they would offer, as some thought it desirable they should, a sufficiently strong barrier against any ambitious Power. And, lastly, the Conference might be said to have considerably modified the views held as to the manner in which the much-needed reforms in those Provinces should be carried out. He had heard that there were some who advised that those reforms should be forced upon Turkey, and this policy had been urged by those who in former years had advocated "peace at any price." Force meant war, either by this country or by some other Power, and it seemed a curious remedy to propose to increase the prosperity and happiness of the subject races by making their country the theatre of a desolating war. It was the boast of our civilization—and the last Franco-German War, happily, furnished a proof of it—that the horrors of war were almost wholly confined to the actual combatants; but if the passions of Eastern nations were let loose, who could say that they would not result in atrocities as terrible as those which had recently been so justly denounced? What he wished to protest against was the notion that any one political Party had a monopoly of the principles of humanity. Another reform which they must all anxiously hope for was that of the system of farming the revenue of the country. He was informed that a great many of those who were guilty of the abuses connected with that system were Christians, and that brought him to express his deep regret that there should be any attempt to import a religious element into this intricate, delicate, and important question. That element, if once excited, could but bring forth feelings of passion and fanaticism, and when those feelings were roused, it was impossible to say what horrors they might not lead to. A great responsibility undoubtedly rested on those to whom the government of this country was intrusted; but he thought they all must acknowledge that those right hon. Gentlemen were not shrinking from their responsibilities. He contended, however, that the responsibility extended over the last 20 years, since the Treaty of Paris was made. It must be a matter for deep regret if during that time the Government of this country had neglected to see that the promises of reform had been carried out, or if our influence in the East had been in any way allowed to decline. It must also be a subject for regret if the Consular establishment of this country had been so much diminished in those parts as to have become unable to discharge adequately the duties which fell to it. Still more must it be a matter for regret if, when those Treaties which were made at the end of the Crimean War were revised and re-enacted, some few years ago, some further steps were not taken to arrest the progress of misgovernment, and to make sure that the reforms promised were duly carried out. What was their position at the present moment? It was admitted that all the other European Powers had great interests at stake in this question, and that they had a right to watch those interests. Had England not the same right to protect her interests? They had been told, in a despatch from Lord Augustus Loftus, that the Emperor of Russia had assured him he had no wish to possess Constantinople. They knew that no other European Power wished for such an acquisition, and they must therefore earnestly desire that the Turkish nation should continue to hold it, having carried out the necessary reforms. This country would never sanction a policy of coercion, nor would it aid those who, under the guise of humanitarian feelings, desired to advance their own interests; and certainly we could never consent to carry war into inoffensive provinces. So far as we know England is not bound by any fresh pledges but is free to act as seems most advisable for her own interests, and those interests are in every possible way to avert war. When the history of these last 15 months came to be written, it would be shown that the great principle of endeavouring to secure the peace of Europe had pervaded the whole policy of this country. There was room to hope that before the armistice expired, Servia and Montenegro would be able to come to an arrangement with Turkey on fair terms and without foreign interference. There was no doubt the greatest watchfulness must still be exercised by Her Majesty's Government, and so long as they endeavoured faithfully to carry out the policy which had hitherto guided them, there was good reason to look forward to a satisfactory settlement of the question. We rejoice to hear that Her Majesty's assumption of the title of Empress of India had been hailed in that country with such general approbation. The ceremony at Delhi, which took place on New Year's Day, was a fitting sequel of an Act of last Session by which Parliament asserted that the Queen of this country was the paramount power in India, and that she was the head of a great confederation of Princes and peoples. The Durbar at Delhi was the ready recognition and admission of these principles, and the expressions of loyalty at Delhi might be taken as an augury of the increasing stability of our rule in India. One of those frightful visitations to which Eastern countries were liable, owing to the peculiarities of their climate, had unfortunately befallen a great part of India; but there was reason to hope that the experience which had been gained during former calamities would be found of great use on this occasion, and that by means of relief works and without indiscriminate almsgiving, the sufferings of the people might be greatly mitigated. In Bengal, also, there had been an almost unparalleled disaster, a storm wave having devastated a large part of the country, and swept away nearly 250,000 human beings. There were great doubts whether any really effective means could be taken to prevent a repetition of such calamities; but there was some consolation in thinking that on such occasions we were able to show the interest we took in India, and the value we set upon the lives of our fellow subjects in that part of the Empire. It must have been gratifying to hear that the colonies generally continued to progress. With regard to Cape Colony they must all congratulate Her Majesty's Government on the choice of Sir Bartle Frere as Governor. No doubt the experience Sir Bartle Frere had gained in Zanzibar and on the East Coast of Africa would be of great service to him in his new position. Perhaps he (Viscount Galway) was trespassing too much on the time of the House; but it would be scarcely becoming to sit down without alluding to one or two of the measures that were to be introduced in the present Session. The press of Business last Session, it was to be regretted, did not allow of the House proceeding with the reforms in the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge. Those measures were to be re-introduced, and would, he was sure, go far to advance the cause of education and the prosperity of the Universities. Another measure of great importance, postponed last year, related to the inequalities of local taxation, and on this subject the numerous discussions that had arisen at the Boards of Guardians all over the country would, no doubt, prove of great service. He had no doubt it would be a source of gratification to the Representatives of Scotch constituencies that Her Majesty's gracious Speech contained an assurance that Scotch business would not this Session be neglected. He earnestly hoped that whatever measures were passed during the Session would conduce to the welfare of the United Kingdom and the happiness of their fellow-subjects. He was grateful to the House for the patient hearing it had given him. The recollection of one, who for nearly 30 years enjoyed the privilege of a seat in that House, during four years of which period he was proud to think he was similarly honoured, and one whose memory he must always cherish, had made his duty less easy, and he could assure the House that it was no mere stereotyped phrase when he thanked them most sincerely for the kindness and consideration they had shown him. The noble Lord concluded by moving—

“That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, to thank Her Majesty for the Most Gracious Speech which Her Majesty has addressed to both Houses of Parliament:

“Humbly to thank Her Majesty for informing us that the hostilities which, before the close of last Session, had broken out between Turkey on the one hand, and Servia and Montenegro on the other, engaged Her Majesty's most serious attention, and that Her Majesty anxiously waited for an opportunity when Her good offices, together with those of Her Allies, might be usefully interposed:

Viscount Galway

"To thank Her Majesty for informing us that this opportunity presented itself by the solicitation of Servia for Her Majesty's mediation, the offer of which was ultimately entertained by the Porte:

"To thank Her Majesty for informing us that in the course of the negotiations Her Majesty deemed it expedient to lay down, and in concert with the other Powers to submit to the Porte, certain bases upon which Her Majesty held that not only Peace might be brought about with the Principalities, but the permanent pacification of the disturbed provinces, including Bulgaria, and the amelioration of their condition, might be effected:

"To thank Her Majesty for informing us that these bases agreed to by the Powers required to be expanded and worked out by negotiation or by Conference, accompanied by an Armistice, and that the Porte, though not accepting them, and proposing other terms, was willing to submit them to the equitable consideration of the Powers:

"Humbly to thank Her Majesty for informing us, that, while proceeding to act in this mediation, Her Majesty thought it right, after inquiry into the facts, to denounce to the Porte the excesses ascertained to have been committed in Bulgaria, and to express Her reprobation of their perpetrators:

"To thank Her Majesty for informing us that, an Armistice being arranged, a Conference met at Constantinople for the consideration of extended terms in accordance with the original bases, in which Conference Her Majesty was represented by a Special Envoy, as well as by Her Majesty's Ambassador:

"To thank Her Majesty for informing us that in taking these steps Her Majesty's object has throughout been to maintain the Peace of Europe, and to bring about the better government of the disturbed Provinces, without infringing upon the Independence and Integrity of the Ottoman Empire:

"To assure Her Majesty that we share Her Majesty's regret that the proposals recommended by Her Majesty and Her Allies have not been accepted by the Porte; but that we trust that the general agreement among the European Powers, as shown by the Conference, will not fail to have a material effect upon the Condition and Government of Turkey:

"To thank Her Majesty for informing us that, in the meantime, the Armistice between

Turkey and the Principalities has been prolonged, and is still unexpired; and to assure Her Majesty that we join with Her in hoping that it will yet lead to the conclusion of an honourable Peace:

"Humbly to thank Her Majesty for informing us that in these affairs Her Majesty has acted in cordial co-operation with Her Allies, with whom, as with other Foreign Powers, Her Majesty's relations continue to be of a friendly character:

"To assure Her Majesty that we rejoice that Her Majesty's assumption of the Imperial Title at Delhi was welcomed by the Chiefs and People of India with professions of affection and loyalty most grateful to Her Majesty's feelings:

"To join with Her Majesty in Her deep regret that a calamity, in the shape of a Famine not less serious than that of 1873, has overspread a large portion of the Presidencies of Madras and Bombay, but to express our confidence that every resource will be employed not merely in arrest of this present Famine, but in obtaining fresh experience for the prevention or mitigation of such visitations in future:

"Humbly to thank Her Majesty for informing us that the prosperity and progress of Her Majesty's Colonial Empire remain unchecked, and that measures have been taken with a view to the safety of Her Majesty's subjects in South Africa:

"Humbly to thank Her Majesty for directing the Estimates of the year to be prepared and presented without delay:

"Humbly to assure Her Majesty that our careful consideration shall be given to the measures which may be submitted to us, and that we earnestly trust that the blessing of the Almighty will attend our labours and direct our efforts."

MR. TORR: Mr. Speaker—Sir, I have the honour to second the Address which has been so ably moved by the noble Lord who has just sat down (Viscount Galway); and I do so, with full confidence in the courteous forbearance of this House.

I heartily concur in the remarks of the noble Lord, expressive of the great satisfaction that it has given to this House, and will give to the nation, that the state of Her Majesty's health has enabled Her Majesty to open Parliament in person at this important juncture.

On entering this Chamber we miss with regret from the front Ministerial Bench a distinguished statesman, who for 40 years has been a prominent Member of this House, for a considerable portion of those 40 years the acknowledged head of the great Conservative Party, and for the last three Sessions the distinguished Leader of this House. The time-honoured name of Mr. Disraeli is no longer upon our rolle; we shall miss his brilliancy and terseness in debate, and his mature wisdom at a moment like the present. But all will rejoice at the high honour conferred upon Lord Beaconsfield by his gracious Sovereign, and heartily wish that the noble Earl may long live to enjoy his well-earned reward.

Mr. Speaker, seldom has Parliament re-opened at a moment of deeper import, or more thrilling interest than the present. We have had a Recess which might more properly be called a Parliament-out-of-Session—a Recess of ceaseless anxiety, intense excitement, and of threatened danger. The "Affairs of the East," which at the close of last Session were beginning to excite the anxious attention of this House, suddenly became intensified by more reliable reports of the terrible Bulgarian atrocities. These cruel outrages raised a spirit of just indignation and horror throughout the length and breadth of the land. Men of the highest position seemed to forget their responsibilities and their calmer judgment, and to listen only to the cry for vengeance upon the perpetrators. No language was too extravagant or inconsiderate. The whole nation of the hated Turks was, by one speaker, to "be driven into the Black Sea;" by another, "the governing classes were to be expelled bag and baggage;" whilst a third, in high-flown language, is reported to have said—"Perish the interests of England, perish her dominion in India, rather than that she should strike one blow on behalf of Turkey!" Amongst these patriotic speakers there was one wise man, who sits on the opposite side of this House, who is reported to have said—

"He was convinced that if the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich and the Liberal Party had been in power they would have done precisely what Lord Beaconsfield and the Tories had done."

On one point, and one point only, were the orators at these daily recurring meetings agreed, which was to condemn the action of the Government without judge or jury.

Mr. Torr

"There was nothing right they said,
And nothing right they did."

But, Sir, I would calmly ask, what real instruction to guide us in this difficult matter have we got from all the hundred excited speeches delivered during the Recess? No distinct policy has been enunciated by the opponents of the Government beyond the old irresponsible dictation—"You should do this, and you should not do that." The "bag-and-baggage" policy coming from the lips of a wise and experienced statesman may satisfy hon. Gentlemen opposite, but will not pass muster in this House. Happily, Mr. Speaker, this wild excitement, these erratic speeches have abated. The storm has become a calm. Much that has been written, as well as spoken from feeling rather than from facts, will be regretted, and we meet to-day, I trust, in a wiser and a calmer mood, putting aside animosity and Party strife, to discuss with the dignity and impartial judgment which becomes the House of Commons the momentous question of the day.

Never was the opening paragraph of Her Majesty's Speech more thoroughly concurred in by both Houses of Parliament—by the nation at large, and by none more than by Her Majesty's Ministers—who, after six months of ceaseless responsibility, and without the sympathy which they might fairly have expected, will now meet Parliament in free debate and be able to lay before the country a full report of all the facts and circumstances that have transpired during the difficult negotiations carried on with the Porte and the great European Powers. Having nothing to conceal, nothing for which to apologize, they will appeal with confidence to the justice of Parliament and of the nation for a dispassionate verdict. The objects looked for by the nation in this troublesome complication were three-fold—(1.) The observance of our Treaty engagements; (2.) Protection for the Christian population of Turkey; (3.) That England should not be involved in war. Two of these great objects have been achieved. England has kept her Treaty engagements; and never for an instant, I feel perfectly sure, have Her Majesty's Ministers contemplated under any circumstances, a repetition of the Crimean blunder, in going to war to uphold Turkey. Not only so, but England has taken an honourable part in maintaining the peace of Europe. Invited by Serbia to offer her good offices with the Porte to secure an armistice, she did not hesitate to comply with the request; but feeling the power and value of the united action of the great Powers of Europe in this important matter, she undertook the responsibility of seeking to bring the six Powers to a Conference; and she succeeded. Through the means of that Conference an armistice was arranged, whereby war, then imminent, was prevented, and the peace of Europe maintained. The further good offices of the Conference were then directed to the object of devising such measures of interference between the Sultan and his disaffected, "maltreated" subjects, as might restore internal peace to Turkey, and prevent the peace of Europe being disturbed. Everyone must regret that Turkey was so ill advised as to reject the minimum form to which the conditions to be imposed were reduced. Yet it cannot be said that the Conference has altogether failed. By the 8th clause of the Treaty of Paris, the Contracting Powers have a right to "mediate." But by the 9th clause the Powers have not—

"the right to interfere, either collectively or separately, in the relation of His Majesty the Sultan with his subjects, nor in the internal administration of his Empire."

By rejecting the terms proposed Turkey has placed herself in antagonism with the united voice of Europe, and must take upon herself the responsibility of her own act. Matters have thus come to a dead-lock. Turkey says distinctly I won't concur. Let me ask how many hon. Members there are in this House who would go to war to "compel" her? And yet we are taunted with the remark that the Conference has been a failure, and that Turkey has triumphed. Was it a "failure" in our noble and distinguished Envoy visiting the different Courts of Europe to ascertain personally the sentiments of each, that he might bring an intelligent judgment to bear upon the difficult mission he had taken in hand? Was it a "failure" in his bringing down the high pretensions and warlike threats of Russia to a parity with the views of the other Powers? Was it a "failure" in Lord Salisbury bringing the six conflicting Powers into perfect harmony in their discussions, and in their final judgment as to the conditions to be offered to Turkey? Or was our noble Envoy to blame for the blind folly which induced Turkey to refuse conditions which, mainly through his instrumentality, had been reduced to a minimum? This country—I might say, Europe—is deeply indebted to the noble Marquess for the high diplomatic talent which he has displayed throughout the whole of these difficult negotiations—for the firmness and judgment with which he carried out the decisions of the Home Cabinet at the Conferences, and with the Sultan—and for his just interpretation of the mind of England. The pressure put upon Turkey by the united voice of Europe and the plain truths spoken to the Sultan will yet bear their fruit. And if that concert of the Powers can be prolonged in harmonious action, instead of being a "failure," it will be the surest and, I believe, the only means of bringing about a regenerated Turkey.

Sir, it is no small satisfaction to be assured by Her gracious Majesty, after the warlike threatenings of the past six months "that her relations with our allies, and with other foreign Powers, continue to be of a friendly character." England in her civilization has happily got past the barbaric age of war, and her mission throughout the world is one of peace.

Every loyal subject of Her Majesty the Queen will rejoice with Her Majesty in the complete success which attended the Proclamation of Her gracious Majesty at Delhi as Empress of India. Nothing could be more noble, more loyal, more enthusiastic, than the language made use of by the great Chiefs, and the hearty, I might say, affectionate, congratulations which they returned to their Sovereign the Empress. India will now enjoy an Imperial Rule, under which we trust her different nationalities will be brought into a lasting bond of unity, and enjoy the triumphs of peace. It is with feelings of deep sorrow that we have read of the double calamity with which India has been visited. The Famine alluded to in Her Majesty's Speech, and the fearful cyclone wave by which upwards of a quarter of million souls were swept away.

A very large proportion of Her Majesty's Speech is naturally absorbed by the Eastern Question; but one is glad to see that other subjects are not omitted. Our Colonies can never be passed over in silence. They are the true outlet for our surplus population which every year becomes larger—our second selves, in fact, and if treated as parts of the Empire and not as mere dependencies they will become more and more the basis of England's great future—a future which the ken of the wisest cannot even guess at.

We now come to the clause in Her Majesty's Speech which brings back our attention to the things of every-day life—The estimates of our national expenditure as compared with our annual income; and we cannot congratulate the Chancellor of the Exchequer upon the state of his finances or upon the flourishing condition of the trade of the country. His lot has unhappily fallen in "the winter of our discontent." Everyone is grumbling at his own losses, and no one can see clearly when "the good times will come again." But that they will come, ere long, is just as certain as that the light of day follows the darkness of night. Prosperity and adversity move in cycles; and the one is simply the reflex of the other, and has nothing to do with politics. What may be termed the "balance of trade" is when the supply and demand are fairly equal to each other. But by varying seasons and a number of other causes, this balance is constantly being disturbed, and hence the ups and downs to which the industries of nations are exposed. Prosperity begets over-trading and high prices; high prices check consumption, and depression follows. But there is always this point in favour of increased trade—the number of consumers is daily on the increase, and the area of consumption is constantly extending. Therefore let not the right hon. Gentleman despair. He has the best wishes of the entire nation that he may get through his Budget without adding to our miseries by asking for another penny income tax.

Amongst the list of Bills to be introduced during the coming Session are the Prisons Bill of last Session, and one for the amendment of the Law of Bankruptcy. I shall be glad to find some modification affecting the appointment of the officers of prisons. In other respects the Bill of the last Session was a good one, aiming at uniformity of discipline, better classification of prisoners, and reduction of local rates by reducing the number of prisons, all of which are very desirable objects. I imagine the proposed Bankruptcy Bill will be something akin to the one introduced into the House of Lords last Session by the Lord Chancellor, and should such be the case, it will be deserving of support. I have myself known several fundamental changes in the Law of Bankruptcy completely diverse in their action. First, placing the control in the hands of the creditors, then in the power and management of a Court with paid officials, and in 1869 again in the hands of creditors. The Bill of 1869 is still in force, but by it there is no compulsory audit of accounts, the management of the bankrupt estate usually falls into the hands of one or two interested creditors, not always too scrupulous in administering the assets. By the statistical Returns quoted by the Lord Chancellor, there appears to be some 20,000 estates at present unclosed and during a period of seven years, a sum of £42,000,000 has been collected and disposed of without an audit, a state of matters which calls for reform.

Not knowing the nature of the proposed Judicature, Ireland, Bill, I can offer no opinion upon its merits, but imagine it is to complete the law reforms in Ireland, which have been going on there as well as in England for some time past. Anyhow I will pledge myself that justice to Ireland will not be overlooked.

Sir, I have now, in a very imperfect manner, completed the task so generously entrusted to me, and I thank the House for the courtesy with which it has listened to my address.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
"That, &c." [See p. 65.]

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON:
Sir, I shall make no excuse to the House for passing over without observation—or with very few observations indeed—the larger number of the numerous subjects to which our attention is called in the gracious speech of Her Majesty. On rare occasions it may happen that interesting and unexpected announcements are made in the Speech; on other occasions it may sometimes occur that the turn of a certain phrase or the manner in which a certain announcement is made is eagerly and anxiously canvassed by the House; but in general it has been the practice to avoid in the Speech from the Throne anything in the nature of startling expressions, and to avoid anything in the nature of expressions likely to lead to excited discussion. On this occasion, although I admit that many subjects to which reference is made are of the highest importance, they are not, with one exception, subjects likely to lead to animated discussion in this House; and as to the projects of the Government on subjects of legislation, it must, at all events, be admitted that they are not of an ambitious character. I think I may say that in the Speech from the Throne, to which we have just listened, Her Majesty's Government have attained successfully to a level—I will not say of dulness, because that would not be respectful, but of repose and reserve to which I do not think any of their predecessors have attained. If this be an accurate view of the case, all the more difficult was the task that had to be discharged by the Mover and Seconder of the Address; and although I must admit that the noble Lord who moved and the hon. Gentleman who seconded it went somewhat beyond, in one part of their addresses, what was usual on these occasions, by making observations of a somewhat Party character, yet that does not prevent me acknowledging, as I am perfectly willing to do, the ability with which they have treated the Speech as a whole, and the interest with which they have succeeded in investing some of its details.

There are one or two expressions in the Speech to which I wish, in a very few words, to call the attention of the House. The Speech at the conclusion of last Session referred to one important subject that had, to a certain extent, engaged the attention of the House. One paragraph in the Speech was as follows:—

"A difference has arisen between My Government and that of the United States, as to the proper construction of that Article of the Treaty of 9th August 1842, which relates to the mutual surrender of persons accused of certain offences. The inconveniences to both countries which would follow on a cessation of the practice of extradition are great and obvious, and I entertain the hope that a new arrangement may soon be arrived at, by which this matter may be placed on a satisfactory footing."

To that important question no reference is made in the Speech which we are now considering. We have been told, certainly, that a satisfactory arrangement has been come to; but, if I am not misinformed, that satisfactory arrangement has been come to upon bases which were held by Her Majesty's Government in the course of last Session to be totally inadmissible, and I think that, although the subject does not find a place in the Speech, the House will, perhaps, expect some explanation in reference to it from the right hon. Gentleman opposite.

There is another subject which, perhaps, could not properly find a place in the Queen's Speech at the opening of the Session, but which was mentioned in the Speech at the opening of last Session, and attracted a great deal of attention. Attention was then called to the state of the law and practice with reference to the surrender of fugitive slaves, and a Royal Commission was promised to inquire into the question. That Commission was appointed, and it reported before the close of the Session; but neither in the Speech which closed the labours of last Session, nor in the Speech to which we have just listened, do I find any reference to that subject, which occupied so important a part of the Speech at the opening of last Session. In the course of the Session—I believe on the last day of the Session—a new Slave Circular was issued, and it is some satisfaction to us who sit on this side of the House to remember that a Motion was brought forward and supported largely on this side of the House by my hon. Friend the Member for Bedford (Mr. Whitbread.) The Circular was issued on the 10th of August, and it distinctly and completely repealed and rescinded the two Circulars that had preceded it, and that Circular, which appeared on the 10th of August, and which was finally adopted by Her Majesty's Government, approached, in its terms, at least as closely, if not more closely, to the terms of the Motion of my hon. Friend as to the Report of the Royal Commission appointed by Her Majesty's Government.

There is one other omission from the Speech which I can hardly help thinking is accidental, but which appears to me remarkable. The House will remember that the subject of the amendment of the laws relating to Merchant Shipping was only partially dealt with last Session. Equal importance was attached by Her Majesty's Government to the Merchant Shipping Bill and to the Maritime Contracts Bill. The Merchant Shipping Bill passed, but the Maritime Contracts Bill was postponed until this Session, and it is rather surprising that neither in the Speech from the Throne nor in the speeches of the noble Mover and Seconder of the Address is there any reference to the latter measure, or any expression that would lead us to suppose that it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government to legislate further upon the subject. We are told that it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government to re-introduce the Prisons Bill. I am not concerned to deny that that Bill, if carried, would, as has been stated by the hon. Member who seconded the Address, effect a considerable and beneficial improvement in our prison system; but, then, we are also told that it will greatly relieve the local burdens. Now, I think that if we knew all, we should be of opinion that Her Majesty's Government do not altogether regret the circumstances which made it impossible for them to pass that measure last year. If I recollect rightly, it was so framed that the relief of the local burdens, which would have entailed a corresponding increase of the Imperial burdens, would not have been effected until the present year; and if the anticipation of the hon. Member who seconded the Address should be fulfilled, I do not think that it will be an inconvenient circumstance to Her Majesty's Government that this additional burden will not fall upon the Imperial Exchequer during the present year, although they were not able to carry into effect their benevolent intentions of relieving the local taxation last year. I cannot help thinking that it is rather a dangerous and rather an inconvenient practice to hold out in a Queen's Speech a prospect of relief of local burdens, but which is nothing more or less than a transfer of taxation from one source of income to another. I cannot help thinking it is somewhat dangerous and inconvenient that these should not be made to fall on the finances of the year in which they are passed, but that they should be postponed to a future and indefinite period. By the absence of any mention in Her Majesty's Speech of the relief of other local burdens, I presume that we may now finally give up all hope of Her Majesty's Government introducing any comprehensive scheme upon the subject of local taxation. They have dealt with the subject of local taxation in every Session since they have been in office. I will not deny that some relief of local burden, as it has been called, has been given; but, as I have said, that relief has been entirely given by means of the transference of the local burdens from local funds to the Consolidated Fund. No attempt whatever has been made by them to deal, as a whole, with what has been over and over again admitted to be the pressing question of the simplification and reform of the complicated system of our local government. If they have made any attempt to deal with portions of the subject, it certainly has been in the direction, not of reform, but of centralization, by taking away from the local authorities power which they previously possessed, and throwing additional duties upon the already over-worked Government Department, instead of giving additional powers to the local bodies, and so making them more capable of fulfilling their proper functions. Therefore it is that I feel myself justified in saying that no attempt has yet been made by Her Majesty's Government to grapple with this subject.

I will now, with the permission of the House, come to that part of Her Majesty's Speech which naturally and properly occupied the most prominent and larger portion of it. I should be justified, if I thought it would be expedient, in entering into considerable detail in the discussion of the negotiations and events which have taken place in the East since Parliament rose last Autumn; but such an examination would probably lead to considerable discussion, which, in the absence of the Papers which have been promised us, could not be conducted under very favourable circumstances in a debate upon the Address. Such a discussion would probably bring to light very considerable and very strongly-marked differences of opinion, and might raise a distinct issue which ought to be placed, and which may yet be placed, before the House at the proper time, but for the raising of which this is not the most convenient opportunity. But the anxiety and excitement which has pre-ailed in the public mind during the last few months, which is even still felt, with regard to the intentions and the position of Her Majesty's Government, leads me to suppose that the Government will not be unwilling to take this, the earliest opportunity in their power, to offer certain explanations upon several points relating to their policy. I think, therefore, that I shall not be misrepresenting the feeling of the House if, avoiding as far as I am able any detailed discussion of the events to which I am referring, I indicate some of the points on which I think explanation is most urgently desired by this House and most ardently wished for by the country. It may, perhaps, not be amiss if I try to state in a very few words what is my view of the position in which we stood, in which the country stood, and in which Her Majesty's Government stood in relation to the country and its affairs at the close of last Session. At that time the country had for some months perceived as clearly, if not more clearly, than Her Majesty's Government, that what is called "The Eastern Question" had been re-opened in its full extent. It had perceived that one of those convulsions had again occurred in Turkey which had before menaced the existence and the permanence of the Ottoman Empire. It perceived that the question was not confined to the disturbances which were actually occurring in some of the provinces of Turkey; but that it extended over a much larger and wider area—that the sympathies of one Power, at all events, and the divided sympathies of another Power, made it quite impossible that those Powers could remain passive spectators of what was going on. It perceived, also, that the changes which were taking place in Europe since the settlement of 1856 had exercised, and must exercise, great influence over the question, and that the combination of those Powers which had brought about the settlement of 1856 could no longer be relied upon, and that other forces had sprung up in Europe, which forces must be taken into account and consideration. What, in these circumstances, was the guidance given to the country by Her Majesty's Government, and what was their policy at the close of last Session, which the country on the whole was prepared to accept? I say on the whole prepared to accept with some amount of doubt and some hesitation. Up to the close of last Session the policy of Her Majesty's Government was that of non-intervention; and if it be not a paradox, I would remark that, as explained to us by the Government themselves, it was a policy not of mere passive, but of active non-intervention. The Prime Minister, in the course of debate in this House, stated that, whereas England had at one time stood in a position of isolation in her policy, that no longer was the case, because at that moment she stood in accord with the rest of Europe in the policy of non-intervention. Lord Derby, in his despatch which was sent on the outbreak of the Servian war, stated that it was undoubtedly the intention of Her Majesty's Government to observe a policy of non-intervention; that they expected that the other Powers would do the same; but that he could not undertake that, in the event of other countries departing from that policy of non-intervention, that policy could be maintained by England. At the close of last Session the policy of Her Majesty's Government was to "keep the ring" and to watch the course of events; not to interfere themselves, and to prevent, as far as they could, anyone else from interfering. It is true that is a somewhat different account of the policy of Her Majesty's Government from what they themselves give of it, much to the surprise of statesmen and of the country. In September last the Prime Minister, speaking at Aylesbury, gave an account of the policy of the Government, which is not altogether consistent with the description which I have just given of it as a non-intervention policy. Lord Beaconsfield said—

"My noble Friend Lord Derby, on whom the strain of the management of this great affair naturally chiefly falls, and who is described every day in the newspapers as a Minister who does nothing and suggests nothing, lost no time in laying down the principles upon which he thought the tranquillity of the East of Europe might be secured—that is to say, he laid down the principles upon which he thought that the relations between the Porte and its Christian subjects ought to be established. I must tell you this—that I think in the late spring of this year peace, and peace on principles which would have been approved by every wise and good man, might have been accomplished. What happened? That happened which was not expected. Servia declared war upon Turkey—that is to say, the secret societies of Europe declared war upon Turkey. These communications were occurring constantly, I may say, between Her Majesty's Government and the five other Powers. . . . From the moment that we declined, and gave our reason why we declined, entering into the Berlin Memorandum, there were, on the whole, I should say on the part of every one of the Great Powers cordial attempts to act with us in every way which would bring about a satisfactory termination, but by no Power have we been met so cordially as by Russia."

That is a description of a different kind of policy from that which we understood had been the policy of Her Majesty's Government, but to this day no explanation had been offered, and no proof had been offered of this statement by the Prime Minister. In fact, the more the Blue Book is searched the less we find that Lord Derby had any proposals to make to the other Powers. He said on every occasion that he did not think the time had arrived for making any further suggestions in the matter. What did the Prime Minister himself say in the House of Commons? That the most desirable thing to do was to maintain the status quo in Turkey, in order to allow Turkey and her subjects in the course of time to find the condition of things which suited them best. There was no hint of efforts being made, or principles being laid down upon which the tranquillity of the East of Europe might be secured. No mention is made of the principles upon which the relations of the Christian subjects with the Porte were to be established, except that the idea of the Prime Minister was that there should be no external interference, but by rebellion and the repression of rebellion they should discover the condition which suited them best. What did Lord Derby say, speaking in the same sense, on June 22nd? He told the Austrian Ambassador that Her Majesty's Government were ready to play their part in the work of pacification when it saw the chance of doing so with effect. But where are the principles which Lord Derby from day to day was laying down? What circumstances led them to alter that opinion? On June the 28th Lord Derby said that he thought it premature to say more than that Her Majesty's Government would gladly concur in any pacific plan for the amelioration of the local government of the Turkish Provinces, but it did not appear that he had arrived at any opinion of his own on which that could be effected.

Well, if this can be described as a policy of active non-intervention, it was perfectly well known that the Government had means of carrying into effect that active policy. There was the Fleet at Besika Bay, and although that motive had been partially denied by Lord Derby, it had been partially admitted by the Prime Minister. It cannot be doubted that they had the means of keeping the ring or taking measures to prevent the intervention of any other country. It cannot be supposed that the idea of availing themselves of this force was ever absent from their minds, and I hope I have now given an accurate state of the case as it existed, and the guidance which the country were with a certain amount of doubt and hesitation prepared to accept. But Parliament had no sooner separated than grave cause of alarm arose. The principle of non-intervention which the Prime Minister had fondly hoped had been embraced by the whole of Europe had not been so embraced. It was very soon known that Russia was giving indirect assistance in the Servian war—assistance of which, undoubtedly the Porte, if it had come with clean hands to Europe, had a perfect right to complain; and it was seen that the condition upon which English non-intervention rested no longer existed, and the question was raised whether that condition no longer existing—English non-intervention was also about to come to an end—and whether we were going to intervene, and if so, upon what side. But at that time there also arrived authentic accounts of the manner of the suppression of the insurrection which had taken place in Bulgaria, and the eyes of the people were opened to the character of the Government to which our Government had certainly shown itself not unfriendly, and to the character of the Government for which they proposed to keep the ring in the contest between Turkey and its rebellious subjects. Well, Sir, it was said now that there never was any danger of our going to war to support the Government of Turkey; but it had not been said then; and there would have been nothing inconsistent in the declarations of the Government that had been made if the Government had then given active assistance to Turkey. The interests of England had been ostentatiously announced on all occasions as the guiding principle of our policy. The interests of England were presumably not affected by the character and manner of the suppression of the insurrection in the rebellious provinces of Turkey, and therefore there was no reason to suppose that the Government, in their defence of the interests of England, would be in any degree influenced by what had taken place, and what had deeply moved the public mind, in Bulgaria. Well, it was to prevent the possibility of England going to war, or giving material assistance in defence of the Turkish Empire, that the agitation of the autumn arose. If there were any exaggeration in that agitation; if there were unnecessary imputations made upon the Government; if there were any undue disposition to exaggerate unnecessarily the generosity of the Russian Government; if there were any unnecessary disposition to assume to ourselves the whole responsibility of putting everything right—for any such exaggeration the Government were mainly, if not altogether, responsible. The Government had declared that the accounts which had been received of the Bulgarian atrocities were untrue. The Government had unnecessarily made themselves the champions and defenders of the Turkish Government, and even in the height of the agitation the Prime Minister inflamed it to a far higher pitch. For in that speech at Aylesbury to which I have referred he denounced the leaders of the agitation; he denounced Servia; he denounced the secret societies; he denounced everybody and everything except the Turkish Government. The injustice and the futility of that denunciation of the Servian Government and the Servian people with reference to the Servian war were made strikingly manifest a short time afterwards. A very few months elapsed, and all Europe perceived that the Servian cause was not merely the cause of an ambitious petty State, that it was not merely the cause of secret societies in Europe, but that the cause of which the Servians had made themselves champions was the cause of the oppressed nationalities of Turkey, and that there could be no settlement of this question and no permanent peace until the grievances under which those oppressed nationalities laboured were removed. In fact, the cause of the Servian people had been taken up by Europe and made their own. I do not think that it is necessary that I should say more with reference to the great and remarkable agitation which undoubtedly sprang up in this country last autumn. If I wanted to say more—if there are those who still think that agitation a mischievous one—I will only remind them that those who are of that opinion are not the Gentlemen who sit upon that bench. The quotation I am about to make to you was made by a Member of the Government. I presume that there is no difference of opinion between them, and that hon. Gentleman opposite will not disown the language used at Derby in October by Lord Carnarvon. He said—

“He certainly had no wish to complain of the public feeling which the tale of horror had elicited. He did not disagree, if he rightly understood it, with the public feeling and opinion because it had been somewhat loudly expressed, and that here and there might have been exaggeration in the language used. He rejoiced, on the contrary, to believe that the heart of his countrymen beat so soundly as it did when such a tale of horror was unfolded. He rejoiced that there was neither delay nor hesitation in the expression of that feeling; and so far from weakening the hands of the Government, he believed that, if rightly understood at home and abroad, nothing could more strengthen the hands of his noble Friend the Foreign Secretary than the burst of indignation which had gone through the length and breadth of the land. There had been horrors, no doubt, historically, which had been as great as these; but these recent horrors come home to us, having been enacted, so to speak, in the very glare and blaze of European civilization, in the very midst and in the very heart of Europe. They were horrors which turned men's blood to flame.”

I have said that I think I should be justified if I entered into some detail on the history of the late negotiations; but I will avoid doing more than placing before the House, as shortly as I can, one or two of the more important and most salient points in those proceedings, not so much for the purpose of discussing the conduct of the Government as of eliciting from them an expression of their opinion. In September Her Majesty's Government departed finally from the policy of non-intervention and committed itself to acts of distinct intervention. On the 21st of September Lord Derby wrote a despatch to the Turkish Government which was practically the answer of Her Majesty's Government to the demand which had been addressed to them in hundreds of meetings held throughout the country on the subject of the atrocities in Bulgaria. What was that answer? It was not an indignant denunciation of the Bulgarian revolutionary party—it was not an indignant denunciation of the secret societies by which the insurrection had been instigated—it was not a repetition of the doubts and hesitations and palliations of which we had heard so much here; but it was a despatch that has been described by one of Her Majesty's Ministers as such a despatch as was probably never before addressed by the Minister of one Power to the Minister of another friendly Power. It spoke in the strongest terms and in the plainest language of the crimes said to be committed by the servants of that Government; it denounced the perpetrators of those crimes by name; it required in the name of Her Majesty the punishment of those persons, and that reparation should be made to the unhappy sufferers. It is true that, as far as we know, the demands made in that despatch have never been complied with, and it is one of the subjects on which I think Her Majesty's Government will be the first to desire to give us information. What steps have been taken in compliance with the demands made in that despatch, or, if no result has followed from that despatch, what steps have Her Majesty's Government taken to enforce those demands? The Home Secretary, speaking at Manchester on October 26, put this point as clearly as I could wish. He said—"As to the question of humanity, no such despatch that I have ever heard of was addressed to a friendly Power as Lord Derby's. It was not a mere empty despatch for insertion in a Blue Book, but one which must be followed out." Well, we agree that it was a despatch "which must be followed out;" and what we want to know is, what steps have been taken by the Turkish Government or by Her Majesty's Government to "follow out" the demands it contained. On the same day Her Majesty's Government made their second departure from the principle of non-intervention. On the same day they made their offer of mediation, and that offer did not apply merely to the questions that were pending between Turkey and Serbia and Montenegro, but their despatch included proposals relating to improved government and to reforms in the disturbed Provinces. In fact, as far as I am able to make out, Her Majesty's Government made, on the 21st of September, the identical proposal to the Porte which had been made by the Russian Ambassador to Lord Derby in June. On the 28th of June there is an account of a conversation between Lord Derby and Count Schouvaloff. It says they then passed to the third subject of discussion—namely, the granting of administrative autonomy or local self-government, in some form. Much discussion followed on this topic. That was on the 28th of June. The proposal had been made by Prince Gortchakoff considerably before, but on June 28 it was fully discussed personally between Lord Derby and Count Schouvaloff, and on the 30th Count Schouvaloff informed Lord Derby that he had heard from Prince Gortchakoff, explaining his meaning on it. He considered that autonomy did not mean sovereignty, but that the sovereignty of the Provinces should remain to the Sultan. Count Schouvaloff explained that Prince Gortchakoff desired simply administrative autonomy, and that if the Sultan yielded this point, the struggle would cease. I have not here with me the exact words of the proposal that was made on the 21st of September by Lord Derby; but I believe that substantially there was not the slightest difference between the proposal embodied in that despatch of September 21 and the proposal which had been made to Lord Derby by Count Schouvaloff in June. It will be for Her Majesty's Government to explain why that which was utterly inadmissible in June was proposed by them in September, and it will be for them to explain whether some part of the responsibility for the blood that was shed in the Servian war—which, in the opinion of Prince Gortchakoff, might have been averted by the agreement of our Government in those proposals—does not rest on the shoulders of Her Majesty's Ministers. I pass over the somewhat intricate negotiations which preceded the conclusion of the armistice. I pass over the adoption by Her Majesty's Government of the proposal of the Turkish Government for a six months' armistice, though that is a matter which it seems to me will on a future occasion require very considerable elucidation. But at this time a very important event occurred, which I refer to now, because I think it has some bearing on the present situation. At one stage, after Her Majesty's Government had adopted the Turkish proposal and the Russian Government had rejected the six months' armistice, our Government retired altogether from the negotiations. They said that they had no other proposal to make; that although they would not urge the Porte to reject the Russian counter proposal, they would not urge it to accept it. In fact, they left Turkey standing face to face with Russia; and I must say they were praised, and praised very loudly, by some of their supporters in the country and in the Press for the position, as it was called, of "magnificent isolation" which they had assumed, for it appeared to be thought that a triumph had been obtained when Turkey and Russia were left face to face. At that moment it depended only on the moderation of Russia or on the conciliatory spirit or the fears of Turkey that a war did not instantly break out between them. I refer to this, not for the purpose of criticizing their conduct of the negotiations, but because it may throw some light on their present position. Well, Sir, war was averted, but not by Her Majesty's Government, and the way was left clear for the assembling of the Conference. We have little information as to the negotiations preliminary to the Conference; but I think we may assume that some preparations were made by the Government for the meeting of the Conference. I do not think it can be supposed that Her Majesty's Government invited the Powers of Europe in so solemn a manner to assemble at Constantinople to discuss such momentous questions as were to come before them without making some provision as to those conditions on which alone the successful issue of that Conference could be expected. What, then, were those conditions? It seems to me that they were, either that Her Majesty's Government had ascertained that Turkey was willing to agree to certain concessions, certain reforms, and to give certain guarantees, which, although they might not be all that might be asked by the other Powers, were yet such as the other Powers might in Conference accept; or, on the other hand, if there were no reason to believe that Turkey was prepared to make such concessions or to give such guarantees, they had arrived at some understanding with the other Powers assembled at the Conference as to the ulterior measures to be taken. Well, we know nothing of the efforts which Her Majesty's Government may have made with these or with similar objects. We do know that Lord Salisbury visited Paris, Berlin, Vienna, and Rome before he went to Constantinople, and it may be that the object of those visits was to secure some such understanding among the Powers as I have just indicated. If it was, and if he failed in that attempt, then I admit that the Government will be more entitled to our sympathy than to our censure. But I think that the question arises whether it would not have been better, before assembling the Conference and inviting all the Powers of Europe to take part in that Conference, to arrive at some certain or definite understanding by which they could alone hope to bring its deliberations to a successful issue. There is one preparation for the Conference on the part of Her Majesty's Government to which I cannot refer without regret. Just previously to the assembling of the Conference the Prime Minister made a speech under circumstances in which, perhaps with the exception of speaking from his place in Parliament, an English Minister speaks under as heavy a responsibility as on any occasion. Lord Beaconsfield, addressing the citizens of the capital of England, assembled under the presidency of their chief magistrate, with representatives of much of the commerce, industry, and wealth of this country present, referred to the Treaties of 1856, I regret to say not referring to the obligations they enforced upon Turkey, but dealing solely with the obligations towards Turkey contracted by other Powers. In that speech he indulged in what I cannot help considering taunts towards Russia. I willingly admit that there were interspersed here and there expressions of great civility towards Russia and her Government; but I remembered that something was said about an ultimatum being an ugly word, when an ultimatum had just been presented by Russia to the Porte, and something also about an ultimatum being a proceeding like bringing an action when the debt had been paid into Court. But that was not all. From taunts Lord Beaconsfield proceeded to menaces. He informed the citizens of London that he trusted all those difficulties might be arranged without war; but he added that if there was to be war, England was not a Power which would have to consider whether that war would last no more than one campaign. Do hon. Gentlemen imagine that that was a prudent observation to make at the very moment that the Conference was about to open, the object of which was to avoid war? ["Hear, hear!"] If hon. Gentlemen think that to draw a contrast between this country which was able to support a number of campaigns and other countries which presumably were not able to support so many was a judicious proceeding, I despair of convincing them of the contrary by anything I can say. But at that very moment, injudicious as that speech was generally supposed to be, the country was not aware of the full amount of the imprudence it involved. Why, at that moment Lord Beaconsfield had received the strongest assurances from the Russian Emperor of his pacific intentions. I do not say that the Prime Minister is bound to place implicit reliance upon the assurances of any Sovereign or upon his power to carry into effect those assurances; but, at all events, one thing was proved, and that was, that the Emperor did desire to go into the Conference without hostile feelings and without jealousy of England, and that he did desire to the best of his ability to obviate hostility and jealousy on the part of England. Surely under these circumstances it was not necessary that the Prime Minister should, as a preparation for the Conference, make declarations that could only tend to revive the jealousy and re-embitter the relations between Russia and England. I shall not detain the House with the discussions which took place at the Conference. Although that Conference has, to a certain extent, been a failure, I think that Lord Salisbury deserves, and will receive, the thanks of the country. Although he has failed in his main object, Lord Salisbury has done much. He has restored, to a great extent, the good understanding between England and Russia. Lord Salisbury has evidently done everything which he was empowered to do to bring the Conference to a successful issue; and we on this side of the House, and I believe the country generally, are grateful to him for the light he has thrown on our relations with Turkey under the Treaties of 1856. I do not wish to disparage those Treaties. I believe they have been, and may yet be, productive of great good. But there were those amongst us who were disposed not to regard those Treaties as instruments by which good might be effected or evil averted, but rather as a chain binding us and taking from us all power of our own—as instruments binding us by every honourable obligation, perpetually, and for ever, to be the defenders and champions of a decaying Empire; and Lord Salisbury at the Conference, if he has been correctly reported, has told Turkey in plain language, and the world, in the name of his Government, and in the name, I believe, of the whole country, what is his view of our relations under the Treaties of 1856, and if it were for nothing more than this, I should say we had reason to be grateful to Lord Salisbury. I entirely concur in the paragraph of Her Majesty's Speech in which it is stated that the result of the Conference has been to show the existence of a general agreement among the European Powers. But the anticipation which follows, that that agreement cannot fail to have a material effect upon the condition and Government of Turkey, depends for its realization, to a very great extent, upon the present proceedings and the present posture of Her Majesty's Government. The expressions in the Speech announcing the failure of the Conference are the least strong terms in which that could be announced; and I should like to ask whether it is true, as has been generally supposed, that Her Majesty's Ambassador, together with the Ambassadors of the other Powers, has been ordered to leave Constantinople as a mark of the displeasure of the Government at the conduct of the Porte, for if that important diplomatic step has been taken, it seems to me somewhat remarkable that the Queen's Speech, entering as it does into so many details, has made no mention of it? In dealing with these one or two points, I have spoken, not with the view of examining the title of Her Majesty's Government to our confidence, interesting as no doubt that is, but because their conduct in negotiations in the past give us the only indications which are at present available of what is their position at present, and what are their intentions in the future. England has made, through her Representative, certain strong representations as to the existence of the Ottoman Empire depending on the acceptance of certain proposals to which Her Majesty's Government have made us a party. Well, those proposals have been rejected. What is to follow? Is anything to follow? If we look to the fate of the despatch of September 21, and, for many months at least, the calm acquiescence of the Government in the neglect with which their demands have been treated, there is, I think, reason to apprehend that Her Majesty's Government are inclined to lend a willing ear to the counsels of those who tell them that with the failure of the Conference, with the refusal of the Turkish Government to accept our terms, with the consciousness of having offered good advice, and with the protest which we have made, our responsibilities are at an end. A few days ago we might have been told that the Conference, after all, had not been barren of results, and that the promulgation of the Turkish Constitution afforded us some guarantee, although not of the kind we desired, for good government in the future. But the news which has arrived within the last day or two must have been enough to shake the faith of the strongest believer in Turkey. I cannot think it a very good augury for the success and stability of the Constitution that within a very few weeks of its promulgation its author should find himself an exile. Well, Sir, if it be the case that some are ready to advise Her Majesty's Government that their responsibilities are discharged by what they recommended and what they failed to obtain at the Conference, I would ask what becomes of the declarations of policy that have been made by Her Majesty's Ministers? The right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the Secretary of State for the Home Department have undertaken before the country not to ask merely for guarantees from Turkey, but to obtain those guarantees. The Chancellor of the Exchequer, speaking at Edinburgh on the 18th of September, said—

"We have long known it was our duty; we accept the duty; we accept it as freely as any of those who challenged us could wish, to fulfil the moral obligation into which this country entered by the Treaty of 1856, at the close of the Crimean War, to use its efforts to protect the Christians of the Turkish Provinces from misgovernment. We know now from the terrible emphasis with which these words have been spoken from Bulgaria what the misgovernment of Turkey means, and be assured that the revelations which have been made have in no degree weakened the sense of duty with which we have been impressed. We know it is a question which must be dealt with firmly and vigorously."

And the Secretary of State for the Home Department, speaking, I think, still more strongly, said—

"The Great Powers have a right to examine for themselves what provision would be sufficient to secure the good administration of those Provinces, and to see that adequate provision is made that all these measures shall be carried into effect. With all due respect to Turkey, I would say that of course the time has come when all what I may call the 'waste paper currency' of the Turkish promises shall be paid in sterling coin."

Well, I do not think the right hon. Gentleman will tell us that when they made these declarations they were merely speaking of proposals to be made and to be carried out or not as Turkey thought fit. I think that when the right hon. Gentlemen made use of these expressions they undertook not merely to ask for reforms, but to obtain reforms and guarantees. Sir, if it be that the responsibility of the Government is discharged by that which has taken place, what, I ask, becomes of the policy of the Government? We have been told that to secure the interests of England is the main object of the policy of this country. We have been told over and over again that the main interest of England is the maintenance of peace, and no doubt we shall be told that peace has been preserved. But, I ask, what sort of peace is it? In the last extract with which I shall trouble the House the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer will give the answer. Speaking at Bristol on November 13, he said—

"I believe it to be impossible really to secure the peace of Europe unless we take steps also for the improved administration of the Provinces of Turkey. As long as you leave that sore open, as long as you do nothing to heal what is at the bottom of the cause of these disturbances, any peace you may promote for the moment will be but a hollow peace, and be but as a patchwork—a piece of sticking-plaister put over a wound when there is festering matter still left below."

vernment is discharged by the failure of the Conference, where, I ask, is the peace which they have pledged themselves to attain? Where is the peace which the supporters of the Government seem to think they have succeeded in obtaining? If we look back to that phase of the question when England retired from the Berlin negotiations and left Turkey and Russia face to face, it may not be unreasonable to suppose that the Government regard with calmness, if not with satisfaction, the prospect of reverting now to a similar position. Sir, can anything be more contrary to the interests of England than that Turkey and Russia should be left face to face? Can anything be more contrary to the interests of England than that Russia should be permitted, if not compelled, to take upon herself the duty which ought to rest on the whole of the Powers that took part in the Conference? The position of Russia has been immensely strengthened by what took place at the Conference. It would be difficult, I think, for any Power which was represented at that Conference to say whether Russia was not within her right when she proposed, in the event of the absence of co-operation from the other Powers, to act independently. I do not suppose anybody is deluded by the rumours that are circulated—whether with design or not—as to the weakness of Russia. I do not suppose anyone is deluded by the moderation shown by Russia at the Conference—a moderation for which there were very sufficient diplomatic reasons. I do not suppose anyone believes that that moderation was the result of military weakness. Perhaps we are trusting to the attitude of Germany and Austria. Perhaps we suppose that Russia, knowing she has no material advantage to gain by war, will shrink from war. But, Sir, Germany and Austria have no interest in Asia or the Asiatic Provinces of Turkey. England, on the other hand, has a great interest in those Provinces, through which, perhaps, some day will be the most direct route to India. Yet there are some among us—I trust that the Government do not belong to the number—who look with calmness, if not with satisfaction, on the prospect of leaving Turkey and Russia face to face, and on the possibility of war springing up between those two countries. Sir, I ask whether the danger of that position, as regards English interests, has diminished; whether it has not rather increased, since the time when Mr. Canning, rather than encounter the perils of such a situation—rather than allow Russia to take upon herself singly the task of enforcing the proposals which had been agreed upon between England and Russia as to the affairs of Greece—was willing even to go the length of proposing to co-operate with Russia for the purpose of attaining the end in view. I am unwilling to believe that the resources of diplomacy are exhausted by the failure of the Conference, and that the efforts of Europe for the maintenance of peace and the obtaining of securities from Turkey are exhausted by the refusal of Turkey. Of this, at all events, I am sure—that the Government will take upon themselves a heavy responsibility if they do not strive to do everything in their power, not to dissolve, but rather to strengthen and prolong the concert among the Powers, for the accomplishment of those beneficent ends which the Conference laboured, but, unfortunately, laboured in vain, to attain.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Sir, I mean to follow the example of the noble Lord who has just sat down (the Marquess of Hartington) by speaking very briefly indeed upon any other subject but that on which he has last addressed the House. But before I advert to his observations on that matter I must, in the first place, acknowledge the services of my noble Friend the Mover (Viscount Galway) and my hon. Friend the Seconder of the Address (Mr. Torr), and I will take the opportunity, if my noble Friend will allow me, of assuring him that there must have been many in this House who sympathized entirely with the graceful expressions with which his speech closed, and that we rejoice to see that a name so long honourably known in this House is borne by one who seems worthy of it. The noble Lord opposite (the Marquess of Hartington) began by complimenting us on having advised Her Majesty to address to Parliament a speech of an unambitious character, and by congratulating the House on the repose which seemed to await it. I trust this prognostication may be agreeably fulfilled in the course of the Session, but I am not so sure that we shall have such entire repose as we may desire. My own impression is that we shall have a lively Session on more points than one, and that we shall meet with more opponents than we at first anticipated. The noble Lord has taunted us with the omission from Her Majesty's Speech of certain subjects which he mentioned. I do not think it is necessary for me to discuss those questions of omission. With regard to the question of the Fugitive Slave Circular, to which the noble Lord also referred, that is a matter as to which it did not seem to me that the House would expect that it should be brought under their notice in the Queen's Speech. It is, however, a subject on which many questions may be asked, and as to which questions I may say that those who ask them shall receive sufficient answers. Then, again, with respect to the Extradition question, to which reference was also made, at the present moment the matter is in a phase of a temporary character; a temporary arrangement has been made, and negotiations are going on which we hope may lead to a satisfactory result. The noble Lord also referred to the Maritime Contracts Bill. Well, it is not the intention of Her Majesty's Government to drop that measure. It stood upon the Paper for a considerable time last Session, and towards the close of the Session I gave Notice of a Motion to refer it to a Select Committee; but as it was found impossible, from circumstances that occurred, to get the Bill through the second reading stage we were obliged to let it stand over till this year. It is, however, our intention to re-introduce it, and I hope, after it has been read a second time, to ask the House to send it to a Select Committee. I will not refer now to the question of Local Taxation, as to which the noble Lord asked one or two questions; but I think I may ask the House to wait until Monday evening next, when I hope my right hon. Friend the President of the Local Government Board will introduce one of the measures of which he has given Notice, and make a statement which will show how far we have advanced and what progress we have made in that matter. These were, I think, the only topics to which the noble Lord adverted, with the exception of the great question of our Foreign policy, and I think, Sir, I shall be entirely conforming to the desire of the House if I now say a few words on that subject. But I am bound to say that the line which the noble Lord has taken—although I have no right to complain of him for doing so—places me in a somewhat embarrassing position, inasmuch as I can neither enter fully into the question, nor decline to reply to his observations upon it. The noble Lord began by intimating—and I think with very considerable justice—that the present was not the occasion on which it was desirable that we should enter into a controversy as to the policy Her Majesty's Government have pursued in regard to the negotiations that have taken place, the Papers not being yet in the hands of hon. Members. I can assure the House that every exertion has been made to get those Papers in a state in which they could be laid before the House, and I believe that to-morrow morning hon. Members will receive the whole of the Papers down to the close of the Conference and the return of my noble Friend the Marquess of Salisbury and Sir Henry Elliot from Constantinople. When those Papers, which are rather voluminous, are in the hands of the House, the noble Lord and his Friends will have an opportunity of quietly considering those matters on which he feels, and has expressed himself as being in some difficulty. He will be able, and other hon. Members will be able, to see and judge for themselves what our course of proceedings during the autumn and winter have been, and we shall then have an opportunity—and, if they desire it, the opportunity will certainly be given—of discussing with the Papers in our hands, all points as to which discussion is considered desirable. But I thought that when the noble Lord had laid down the principle that it was not desirable to go into controversial matters now, he would have acted and spoken in accordance with the spirit of that observation. The noble Lord has, however, in more than one part of his speech, indulged in severe criticisms and comments, which it is almost equally difficult for me to answer or to pass by. If I answer them I necessarily enter into a controversy as to very difficult matters of an inconvenient character; for if I enter into it with the Papers in my own hands, I am able to refer to matters some parts of which the House is necessarily ignorant of. If I enter into the controversy, and defend the action of the Government on certain points on which the noble Lord has thought it right—and I admit he has the right—to challenge our conduct, it may be necessary for me to enter into somewhat lengthened and controversial discussions as to the conduct of other Powers, whose action in these matters is not to be entirely taken for granted, and whose action is by no means unimportant with reference to some of the questions raised. Before I came down to the House I had laid down for myself, as a guide in the observations I would address to the House, a principle similar to that announced by the noble Lord—that I would abstain as far as I possibly could from touching on anything irritating or controversial. If, however, we are challenged or brought to a controversy, we shall be able to meet the noble Lord, or anybody else who ventures to challenge us; and if the attacks which are likely to be made upon us are such as have been foreshadowed by the observations of the noble Lord, I entertain very little doubt indeed as to the result. It seems to me that throughout the whole of his remarks the noble Lord has himself been misled, and consequently has been constantly misrepresenting our conduct in the various stages of these transactions, not of course intentionally, but from a want of understanding it. He is the last man I would accuse of wilfully doing such a thing; but over and over again in the course of his observations the noble Lord made charges which, if he had had the Papers in his hands and had given them the study which I am sure with his candid mind he would have given them, he would not have made; and I do think it is a disadvantage, not only in reference to the interest of one Party or another, but to that of the country, that, in a matter of this importance, we should have a merely partial, one-sided, and imperfect discussion. The noble Lord does not overrate, nobody can, the importance of the present position of affairs, and the very great importance of weighing every word we use at the present time, and of considering well every step we take; and I do think that it is hard that we should have been subjected, as we have been for a considerable time, to representations which have gone abroad, and have been accepted abroad by persons who naturally take the authority on which they were made as high authority, and yet which have been such as to give an entirely false and erroneous view of the policy we have adopted—the policy not only of the Government, but of the country. We think that an actual knowledge of the facts detailed in these Papers will prove the wisdom and rectitude of our conduct, and entirely remove that erroneous impression. The noble Lord has been very profuse in his quotations from speeches which were made during the Recess by Members of Her Majesty's Government. I can assure the noble Lord that we feel the compliment which has been paid to us, and for my own part I am greatly obliged to him for having read sentences pronounced by myself on one or two occasions which I should have thought would not have attracted so much attention, but every one of which I am prepared to say I entirely and wholly adhere to. Among others, the noble Lord read an extract from a speech—and a very excellent one it was—made by my noble Friend the Earl of Carnarvon, in which my noble Friend said, in reference to speeches made at those indignation meetings to which the noble Lord referred, "he believed that, if rightly understood at home and abroad, nothing could more strengthen the hands of his noble Friend the Foreign Secretary." Well, but in the words "if rightly understood at home and abroad" lies the importance of a great many of the speeches made and of the acts done during the Recess; and what I complain of on the part of the Government is, that on more than one occasion misunderstanding has been caused by speeches and writings which have not been rightly understood. The noble Lord has referred to certain speeches made by my noble Friend the Prime Minister, and said that those speeches have done a great deal of harm. If harm was done by those speeches, it was not by the speeches themselves, but by the construction which was put upon them, and, as I maintain, very erroneously put upon them, by those who misunderstood them. There has been an industrious attempt made for a considerable time past—for what reason I cannot undertake to say—to represent the Government of this country as having a desire to carry the country into a war on behalf of Turkey, and as being desirous of encouraging her in her policy. Now, I assert, without fear of contradiction, that there has been nothing in any action of the Government, or in any words written or spoken by the Government to justify such a representation. On the contrary, from a very early period of those transactions—from a period antecedent even to the question raised by the Bulgarian atrocities—the language used by my noble Friend (the Earl of Derby) in his despatches, as the organ of the Government speaking for the country, and by other Members of the Government, has always been to the effect that England would not undertake that course of proceeding. I can find, I think, a sentence of my noble Friend's, at a very early date indeed, at the very time of the rejection of the Berlin Memorandum, bearing out this view of the case. It is in the Papers presented last Session. As far back, I think, as the 19th of May last, Her Majesty's Government, explaining to Sir Henry Elliot for the information of the Porte what course had been taken with regard to the Berlin Memorandum, and the reasons why they had thought it undesirable to concur in it, go on to say that they do not desire to counsel the Porte to resist any advice or proposal which the Porte may consider advantageous, and that they cannot conceal from themselves that the gravity of the situation has arisen in a great measure from the weakness and apathy of the Porte in dealing with the insurrection in the first stage—[Mr. W. E. FORSTER: Hear, hear!]

—and in the want of confidence in the Turkish powers of government shown by the state into which the finances had been allowed to fall—

“The responsibility must rest with the Sultan and his Government, and all that can be done by the Government of Her Majesty is to give such counsel as circumstances may require. They cannot control the events to which the neglect of the principles of good government may expose the Porte.”

I thought I caught a laugh from the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bradford when I read some words as to the want of proper energy on the part of the Government in dealing with the insurrection in the first instance. Do I understand the right hon. Gentleman to suppose that the only meaning of the phrase I have quoted was that, in our opinion, the Porte should have used more physical force in subduing the insurrection? If that is what he thinks he is entirely under an erroneous impression, because the language always used by Her Majesty's Government, even in the earliest stages of the insurrection, was to the effect that the Porte ought to take every means in its power to satisfy the wants of the insurgents; that they ought to make themselves acquainted with the real causes of the insurrection, and then, by manfully grappling with them, to remove those parts of the Government system which were objected to, and had resulted in evil. I cannot trouble the House by searching Blue Books for every expression, but I will undertake to say there is the strongest possible evidence that that was the line and the meaning of the expressions used by my noble Friend. [Mr. W. E. FORSTER: Oh, oh!] My right hon. Friend says “Oh.” I can only say that I will undertake at the proper time to make good all that I have said on this branch of the subject. Throughout all that has been done there is an apparent desire to throw blame upon us in a manner which I consider very unfair. The noble Lord has charged my noble Friend with having suggested that Europe should keep a ring, in which this contest between Turkey and Servia should be fought out, and he has described that as a very objectionable thing to be done. I think that if my noble Friend made use of any expression that could be construed into such a phrase, he must certainly be condemned for want of originality, he might even be said to be a plagiarist, for long before he had made use of it, it had already been used by the Representative of another Power. I notice that in a despatch of Lord Augustus Loftus, dated 20th of April, he describes an interview which he had had with Prince Gortchakoff, in the course of which the Prince expressed an opinion that the negotiations hitherto carried on between the Porte and the insurgents being exhausted, and the Porte having appealed to arms, the European Powers had only to await the decision of combat. La parole, he said, est aux canons. When such language is used by Prince Gortchakoff it passes unchallenged, but when anything like it is said on the part of England it is made a subject of the deepest reprobation. I ask why. And I ask again if it is fair that we are to be drawn into a discussion of this kind at a time when we do not feel ourselves thoroughly at liberty, and when it would not be convenient for the House to go into a discussion of the conduct of each and every Power in connection with each and every branch of these proceedings? I only give this instance as showing that what is condemned in us is passed over when done by others. I regret to have been forced to say so much on this branch of the subject as I have done, for I deprecate any attempt at the present time to induce the House to enter upon a discussion as to the conduct of Russia or any other of the Great Powers with whom we have been acting in reference to this question. My belief is that at the present moment we stand in a position which is full of hope as well as full of anxiety. My belief is that the result of the Conference has been by no means what is described as a failure. It is true that it has not at present led to the adoption of those particular proposals which were agreed upon by the Powers, and in so far as that goes, undoubtedly it was a failure; but in other respects it is not a failure. It has led to a good understanding among the Six Powers, to a comparison of their demands, and to an elimination from those demands of whatever seemed extravagant or dangerous, or which would not have been accepted. It has also produced a feeling of cordiality and mutual respect which I believe cannot fail to be of the utmost importance in the future conduct of European affairs if we are only allowed time and fair play, and an attempt is not made to make our every action, tone, and word suspect, by putting upon it an interpretation which its authors would disclaim, which can lead to no good, and may lead to much mischief. What I object to is the emphasizing everything that you can lay hold of—emphasizing everything that can tell against your own country. [Interruption.] Do I understand the right hon. Gentleman opposite to say—"Does your own country mean the Government?"

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: The right hon. Gentleman is wrong in supposing the observation which he questions to have been made by my right hon. Friend. I may say it was I who made the observation; but I do not know that the right hon. Gentleman has heard me quite correctly. What I said was, "For country read Government."

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I beg the noble Lord's pardon. He draws a distinction between the country and the Government, a distinction which he is perfectly justified in drawing, and which I think he ought to put to the test. The noble Lord will hardly deny that in these matters this country has to maintain an important position. He will hardly deny that this country must be represented by its Government for the time being; and if the noble Lord means to imply by the correction which he has just now kindly supplied us with, that the Government does not represent the country, the sooner he takes steps to bring that to the proof the better. I regret, as I said before, that we have got into such controversial matters. I can assure the House that it was very far indeed from my intention when I came to this House to be betrayed into this kind of discussion, but I have been provoked into it, and I regret that we should on this first night of the Session have diverged from what I think is the more convenient and the better course. The noble Lord has taken this opportunity of asking certain questions of the Government; and nothing could be more convenient or legitimate than that questions should be put, and that we should endeavour to answer them as far as possible. But I must distinguish between questions which are really questions put for information as to the attitude of the Government, and questions which are put, I may say, in the nature of taunt or attack. As to the observations made on speeches of the Prime Minister and other matters of that sort, they are very legitimate indeed for a subject of attack if there is a distinct question at issue before the House, but I do not exactly see in what respect the particular questions the noble Lord has put bear upon the actual matter of interest to the country—namely, to know what the attitude of the Government is, and what the policy of the Government is and has been. I must say with regard to some points in the observations of the noble Lord, I think a more careful study of the Blue Books of last Session would have shown him that there was not quite so great a discrepancy between the speech of the Prime Minister at Aylesbury and the facts of the case as he seems to believe. But I will not do more than just call attention to one of those despatches—I mean the despatch from Prince Gortchakoff to Count Schouvaloff, communicated to Lord Derby by Count Schouvaloff on the 19th June, in which His Majesty the Emperor of Russia is referred to as seeing with much satisfaction the initiative taken by Mr. Disraeli, and the confidence again shown towards Russia. “We feel ourselves,” the despatch proceeds, “not undeserving of it, and we shall answer it with the most complete reciprocity.” He then goes on to state what the views of the Russian Government are, and how far they correspond with the views of the Prime Minister. I mention this merely to show that communications were going on between Her Majesty’s Government and the Russian Government at the time of which Lord Beaconsfield spoke in the Aylesbury speech. It is quite true that these negotiations did not assume the formal shape of ordinary despatches, but the reason of that is that they were to a great extent conversations between the Prime Minister, Lord Derby, and the Ministers of Russia and Austria in particular, in order, if possible, to arrive at some solution of the difficulties which had arisen after the refusal of Her Majesty’s Government to join in the Berlin Memorandum. I do not remember the exact words which Lord Beaconsfield used at Aylesbury; but he was perfectly right in saying that we did not, after rejecting the Berlin Memorandum, withdraw ourselves into our shell and say, “we will have nothing to do with the matter;” but we did endeavour as well as we could to see what arrangement could be brought about. Aye, and fruit came of that arrangement, because the main point of difficulty with which he had to deal was as to the particular system of autonomy which it would be best to introduce into the insurgent Provinces. There was a difference in the views of the Austrian and Russian Governments as to the exact amount of autonomy that should be proposed, and Lord Derby and the Prime Minister were exerting themselves to bring about some solution that should settle the question. And we see the result, because, in point of fact, when the Conference came to be proposed, these discussions bore their fruit, and a definition of autonomy was arrived at which was satisfactory to both Powers. While I mention this, I think these are questions on which it would probably be more satisfactory that we should hear what the Prime Minister himself will be able to tell the country in answer to questions which I have no doubt have been similarly put to him in “another place.” What I am anxious to say is this—the House must not suppose that we have been without a policy, or that we have been shifting and changing in our policy throughout these transactions. Nothing is more easy than to represent that on such a day, the 21st September, you suddenly changed your position, and that as the days began to get shorter your policy began to be different. There is not the slightest foundation for such a charge against us. The House must recollect that there are certain times and particular crises when it may be necessary to write a despatch of a different character from those which preceded it. There is a time for everything. Thus the despatch which was written by my noble Friend the Secretary for Foreign Affairs in reference to the Bulgarian atrocities, and which my right hon. Friend (Mr. Assheton Cross) said was a very strong despatch for one friendly Power to have written to another, could not have been written until we had received authentic information supplied by our Ambassador with regard to those atrocities. Therefore, it was not the case that a change suddenly came over the line of the Government policy when that despatch was written; but the fact was the despatch was written at the time we had received the information, which had not been in our possession before. With that simple fact we give an explanation that ought to put an end to those far-fetched and rather invidious suggestions which have been made as to a change having occurred in our policy at that time. Then the noble Lord goes on to say, “It was on the 21st of September when you for the first time proposed mediation.” It is clearly impossible, without the Blue Books being in the hands of hon. Members, for me to ask them to follow me through all the negotiations that have occurred, but in brief they amount to this. We told Parliament and the country when we separated in the Autumn that we must wait—that we could do nothing at that time when the war had broken out, but they might depend upon it that as soon as opportunity presented itself we should seize it as speedily as we could to offer our good offices to put an end to it, and the moment that such an opportunity did present itself, on the application of the Prince of Servia for our mediation, and as soon as it was possible to complete the necessary correspondence to which that application led, we availed ourselves of it. That is the natural—and, as I should have thought, the self-evident—reason why that particular time was chosen for our interference. The noble Lord referred just now to some remarks which I made during the Recess. I am anxious to repeat those remarks to the House. I still believe most fully, as much now as when I said it before, that our object should be to preserve peace, but that peace cannot be placed upon a solid footing unless it is accompanied by measures for the improvement of the government of the aggrieved Christian Provinces of Turkey. It is the belief of Her Majesty's Government that it is an object of paramount and cardinal importance to the peace of Europe, and therefore to the interests of England, that an improvement should be made in the government of those Provinces. We believe it as fully as the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Gladstone). We have never disguised our opinion about it, and the only question has been in what manner that good government is to be brought about. My right hon. Friend the Member for Greenwich has on more occasions than one told us that we have incurred by the events of the Crimean War and the Treaty of 1856 a special responsibility for the good government of the Christians in Turkey. I will not now enter into a discussion on the precise limits of that special responsibility; but we do acknowledge that we stand in a different position with reference to the Christian populations of Turkey from that in which we stand to the subjects of other Powers, and we recognize it as our duty by every legitimate means in our power to look after and to care for the condition of those populations. But we must remember how difficult a matter this intervention must necessarily be. Some years ago almost everybody in this House, and certainly every one on the opposite side, would have sprung to his feet had it been said that the doctrine of England with regard to the internal affairs of other countries was anything but that of a policy of non-intervention. The term "non-intervention" appears to be rather less popular with hon. Gentlemen on the other side of the House now than it used to be. But that doctrine is one which is based upon very sound and good reasons; although it ought not to be pushed to an extreme, and is one which must at times be departed from, and which we must not adopt in its narrowest and most exclusive sense. If you say you refuse to interfere in the affairs of a country in consequence of your wishing to save yourselves trouble, and being put to a great expense of blood and treasure, it may become a question whether you are acting right or not, but at all events it is a matter about which each country must judge for itself how far it will make up its mind to go. But beyond this you have to consider as a great reason for caution in intervention—that if you hastily intervene in the affairs of a foreign country, you will very seldom find that your intervention succeeds in its object. I do not say that if you have a particular object in view, such as to force a country to give up a war, or to yield one of its Provinces, or if you make this or that definite demand upon it, such as the giving up of a prisoner, that you may not intervene, and put on pressure, and be successful in your interference. But if you intervene for the general purpose of introducing good government into a country which for centuries has been misgoverned, you are undertaking a task which you are exceedingly likely to fail in, and it is quite probable that you may succeed not only in not doing what you would, but in making matters worse by an intervention which is not a wise one. That would especially be the case if you were endeavouring to improve the government of a country against the will of the governing power itself. If you bring it to co-operate with you, good may be done; but if you are endeavouring by force to arrange a system by which the government of the country may be improved against the will of the sovereign Power of that country, you are undertaking a task which is exceedingly difficult. Now, I venture to think the course we have pursued has been the right and prudent course. We have endeavoured as far as possible, not only by advice, but by the strongest pressure short of coercion, by the strongest pressure of our authority and advice, earnestly, urgently, and repeatedly pressed upon the Porte to induce that Power to take a course which we believed, and our Allies believed, would be beneficial to its Christian population. That is the point to which the Conference brought matters when they presented their proposals to the Porte, and I deeply regret the conduct of the Porte in refusing them. I think that conduct is most ill-advised, and that it will entail responsibilities upon that country which to her boldest statesman must appear very alarming. What course we are now to take must be a matter for consideration; but I can assure the House that it is a subject that is engaging the gravest consideration of Her Majesty's Government. We have laid down one or two lines for our guidance. We have from the beginning said what we say now, that we are not prepared to have recourse to coercion. We desire to avoid separate action, we desire to have common action, we believe that in this matter it is for the interests of all parties, including the Christian populations of Turkey themselves, that we should have common action among all the Powers, because we believe that in common action lies the best chance for securing the better government of those Provinces. Separate intervention will always be suspected. Separate intervention by any Power—and I say it without the slightest notion of offence—separate intervention by such Powers as Russia and Austria is sure to be suspected, because it is impossible that these Powers should not be suspected of having private interests of their own which may affect their conduct subsequently. It is, therefore, better for all parties that the intervention, whatever it may be, should be in common, and by the Powers acting altogether. Now, we hope that by the course which has been taken during the proceedings of the year that we have brought matters to this point—that the Powers are sincerely and substantially agreed and are prepared to act together. But it is necessary in concerted action that you should use your own judgment. It would not do to obtain concert by blindly surrendering your own judgment to that of every other Power. We desired concert at the time of the presentation of the Berlin Memorandum, but we could not see our way to it, and we should have acted improperly if contrary to our judgment we had accepted the proposals of that Note. And, similarly, in all the other proposals we have made we have endeavoured to act upon our own judgment, and upon that judgment we intend to act in future. I will not trouble the House with any speculations as to what is likely immediately to happen. The noble Lord opposite has referred to what he calls the recent revolution in Constantinople, but which is rather a change of Ministry than a revolution, and has made the fall of a Minister the text for some remarks upon what he supposed might be said of the value of the new Turkish Constitution. I am bound to say that giving every credit to the authors of that Constitution, and being willing to look at it in the most favourable light as a piece of paper legislation, I cannot put the smallest confidence, nor, I believe, could anybody put the smallest confidence, in any Constitution of that kind affording a remedy for the evils which you have to deal with. Constitutions cannot be improvised in a few months and imposed on a country wholly unaccustomed to them; neither can it be supposed that they will have all the effects in a country like Turkey that they have in a country to which they are indigenous. Constitutions are the growth of centuries, and though it may be possible—I do not pretend to form an opinion on such a matter—that if this Constitution were allowed to work for a considerable time, and were allowed fair play and were honestly worked, it might suit the Turkish nation and might lead to beneficial results to the Christian Provinces of that country; yet it is ridiculous to suppose that the mere proclamation of a Constitution without guarantees that it will be properly administered could produce any sensible results. So far as the effect to be expected from the Constitution is concerned, I think there is comparatively little importance in the change to which the noble Lord has referred; but I think we are bound to consider that in this matter we must give credit to Turkey for the willingness she has shown to reform herself. We must bear in mind that when the Powers said—You must improve your system of collecting the revenue, you must improve your judicial system, you must improve your police system, Turkey has not obstinately set herself down and said “No.” She has not said, “No; you have no right to interfere, and I trust you will not meddle with these matters,” but she has expressed her willingness and anxiety to grant these reforms. I know it will be said we have to deal not so much with obstinacy against reform, as with the weakness of a country which has been so long obstinately misgoverned, in our efforts to produce a better system of government. But we were of opinion that in making the proposal we did to Turkey at the Conference we were offering her that which she most wanted; that we were offering it in a form as little offensive to her pride and dignity as possible; and that we were offering her external guarantees to enable her to do the work which she said she was willing to do. It was the intention of the Government that upon matters of detail there should be the freest discussion with those who being charged with the government of the country, and having a knowledge of its circumstances, might be supposed best able to devise those measures that were needful for Turkey. What was important for us to do was to obtain some kind of guarantee that these improvements, when decided upon, should be carried into effect. Now, we believed that among the great evils which beset Turkey there was none greater than the constant change of provincial Governors. Everybody who speaks about the condition of Turkey and the evils under which she suffers will tell you that one of the greatest of those evils is the constant change of the Governors of Provinces, and that no sooner has one Governor become acquainted with the circumstances of a Province, and acquired an interest in it, than another man goes behind his back, offers a large sum of money for his removal, and gets himself appointed Governor of the Province, which he oppresses and misgoverns. One of the objects we had in view at the Conference was that these changes should be put under some restraint, tending to give greater security of tenure to the office of provincial Governor. With regard to police and judicial reforms, what we wanted to do was not to impose a new Constitution upon Turkey, but to get guarantees that Turkey would endeavour to carry into effect those reforms which were necessary. I am asked what is the policy of the Government? Well, I say the policy of the Government is expressed in a short paragraph of Her Majesty's Speech. Her Majesty says that—

We are taunted with speaking of the independence and integrity of the Ottoman Empire, and with referring to the Treaties of 1856 and 1871, as if they were Treaties by which we were slavishly bound to Turkey, while we neglected to regard them as giving us opportunities of doing good to her subjects. I entirely deny that. We are neither slavishly bound to the Treaties, nor did we neglect the opportunities afforded of doing good under those Treaties. And whether you say this or that step was directly required by the Treaty or not, we have proceeded in the sense of the Treaty of 1856, which was confirmed and ratified by the Treaty of 1871; and we have been endeavouring to make use of the influence and discharge ourselves of the responsibility acquired by that Treaty for the benefit of the populations of Turkey. It is impossible that we can have any other object. When you talk of British interests, of course there are special British interests in connection with this subject, just as there are also Russian and Austrian and other special interests. But we have interests in some respects of a more peculiar character than those of the other European Powers, and when we speak of British interests we speak of them in the broadest and highest sense. The great interest of England is that we should maintain an honourable peace throughout the world; and that is not only the interest of England, but the interest of the whole world. Can anybody look around over the map of Europe, and point to any country which has not more risk of loss than prospect of gain by any disturbance or a state of hostility? In any case, I venture to say that in every instance the interest of England coincides with the interests of the rest of the world for peace. Well, if that is the case with the Great Powers it is also the case of small Powers like Roumania, Servia, and Montenegro, which are growing communities, but which are disturbed in the progress of their growth by the quarrels which are fastened upon them. I think you will find in these Papers a most touching remonstrance from the Government of Roumania, showing how her progress has been checked, and what misery has been caused by the state of disturbance in which she has been kept. Therefore I assume, and I venture to say you will do harm by keeping up a state of agitation. I say that the interests even of the populations in the disturbed Provinces in Turkey themselves are best to be served by the maintenance of peace; and I believe it is far more probable that a satisfactory arrangement will be made by the maintenance of peace in those Provinces than by disturbance and war. That is the policy which Her Majesty's Government have endeavoured to pursue, and which as long as we are honoured with the confidence of the country we shall continue to pursue. We desire to bring about and maintain a common concert in these matters; but let me say, if we are to maintain a common concert with other countries, it is absolutely essential that we should wish to be respecters of Treaties. There is a great desire now to throw dirt, if I may use so familiar an expression, upon the Treaty obligations by which we are bound. There is even an attempt to say that the Treaty of 1856 has been broken, and therefore is in no way binding, because Turkey has not observed it herself. [Mr. MUNDELLA: Lord Salisbury said so.] I shall be rather surprised to find that that language has been used by Lord Salisbury. What I say is, the Treaty of 1856 was renewed by the late Government only six years ago—in the year 1871. Now, how is it that Turkey has broken the Treaty of 1856? What Article has she broken of it? You will say she has broken the spirit of the Treaty, because she has not governed as she ought to govern. Did she govern as she ought to have done down to the year 1871? No advantage was taken by the British Government of the opportunity then afforded to make a representation to Turkey that she had broken that Treaty. At the time when the Treaty was brought under review, the Government of Russia did point to certain breaches which she said had been made in the Treaty. Those breaches were, I think, of a remarkable character, having reference to the grant of greater freedom to Roumania, for instance, and other things; but the point was never urged, was never realized that Turkey was in any way guilty of a breach of that Treaty in respect of the misgovernment of the Christians. But, surely, if misgovernment puts an end to a Treaty of this important character, the charge should have been pointed out and advantage taken of it by those who are responsible for the renewing of the Treaty. I do not for a moment bring this forward in order to cast reproach upon the late Government, but rather to show that they must have known and seen, as we know and see, the great practical difficulties of dealing with this question. It was not that their attention had not been directed to this question, for it had frequently been brought on in connection with Cretan affairs, but still the question was not raised, and the despatches published in 1860 or 1861 show that full and ample notice had been taken of the misgovernment of Turkey. What the Government of that day was endeavouring to do was no doubt the right thing to do—to bring their influence to bear for the improvement of Turkey, and the fact that they brought their influence to bear is a proof that the exertions we have made to bring about a better state of things will compare not unfavourably with those of our Predecessors. I must apologize to the noble Lord if I have omitted to notice any other matters which I ought to have noticed; but there was one point on which the noble Lord spoke with regard to our having retired for a certain period from the armistice negotiations. I think the noble Lord had better wait till he has the whole of the Papers in his hands, and he can follow the whole transaction. I think he will see, and the House will see, that it is fair to wait until we can follow the whole of the negotiations. The noble Lord has certainly not given the version which I think he would give if he had taken the whole negotiations together; but beyond saying that I would rather not enter into a discussion of the subject just now. I have only one word more to say, and that is this—that when the noble Lord, and those who agree with him on this subject, receive the Papers they will see a full official account of all the proceedings connected with the Conference, they will see the Instructions given to Lord Salisbury, and they will see in how faithful a manner those Instructions were carried out. The people of England have every reason in this matter to be proud of their Representative; and if, unfortunately, the result has not been in all respects such as it was our desire that it should be, we shall, I am sure, all be ready to admit that it was not owing to a failure on the part of my noble and distinguished Friend. But I wish it to be understood that in what was done my noble Friend was not acting, as some persons would have us believe, on his own judgment alone, and that he was not striking out a new line, and one that was not authorized or prescribed to him by his Instructions. On the contrary, my noble Friend was strictly in accord with his Instructions in all those proceedings. I saw, and saw, I may say, with some amusement, the other day in a newspaper which takes a great interest in the subject, a quotation from some of the closing words—or nearly the closing words—which Lord Salisbury used in one of the last meetings of the Conference; and the remark was made that if such language as that had been used by Her Majesty's Government, it would have given a very different colour to their proceedings in this matter. But these identical words, I think, were taken by Lord Salisbury from the Instructions with which he was furnished; and I will venture to read to the House a few words from those Instructions.

MR. GLADSTONE suggested that the right hon. Gentleman was out of Order in reading from an unpublished document.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I think, Sir, I may take the opportunity of reading a few words from the Instructions given to Lord Salisbury, which will be found in these Papers. [Mr. GLADSTONE: Order, order!] I imagine I am strictly in Order in reading an extract from a Paper which has been formally laid on the Table of the House. Even if it had not been formally laid on the Table, I think my right hon. Friend will admit, if he looks to the precedents, that I should be justified in reading from a Paper which I propose to lay on the Table. I should not be justified in reading from a Paper which I said I could not lay on the Table; but when I am proposing to read a few very short extracts from the Instructions given to Lord Salisbury, in order to show what the spirit was in which he was sent to Constantinople, I think the House will bear with me. I would simply say, in the first place, that in the early part of the Instructions laid down for Lord Salisbury's guidance — ["Order, order!"] If any hon. Member says I am out of Order I am willing to sit down and argue the point, but I am not disposed to be stopped in doing that which I believe to be strictly in Order. Lord Salisbury having been informed of the general views of Her Majesty's Government, first of all of the English basis on which the Conference was founded, and then of the scheme of administration which Her Majesty's Government were to propose, the Instructions went on to say—

"Her Majesty's Government have not endeavoured to offer more than the outline of a system of local self-government, in which they have aimed at the establishment of provincial administration under Governors whose ability and integrity would be vouched for by the guarantee of a diplomatic veto, acting with provincial elective assemblies having control over the local taxation, with permanent judges and other higher officials appointed under a similar guarantee, and with a reformed system of local militia and police, the removal of any remaining Christian disabilities, the improvement of the land laws, and the amelioration of the condition of the whole agricultural population.

"Her Majesty's Government believe that if some such system of local self-government could be established, it would form the best guarantee for the well-being of these provinces, and open the way to the general adoption of reformed and constitutional Government throughout the Turkish Empire.

"Having thus stated the nature of the guarantees which Her Majesty's Government consider may fairly be demanded of the Porte, it remains for me to state explicitly that Her Majesty's Government cannot countenance the introduction into the Conference of proposals, however plausible or well-intentioned, which would bring foreign armies into Turkish territory in violation of the engagements by which the Guaranteeing Powers are solemnly bound.

"In authorizing your Excellency to declare this determination on the part of Her Majesty's Government at the Conference, should occasion require it, they desire at the same time that it should be understood by the Porte that Great Britain is resolved not to sanction misgovernment and oppression, and that if the Porte by obstinacy or apathy opposes the efforts which are now making to place the Ottoman Empire on a more secure basis, the responsibility of the consequences which may ensue will rest solely with the Sultan and his advisers."—[Turkey, No. 2, p.p. 9, 10.]

Sir, the Sultan and his Advisers have taken upon themselves that responsibility, and it now rests with the other Powers of Europe to consider what course they shall take in consequence. Her Majesty's Government will enter into consultation with our Allies on this subject; and I feel confident that, whatever may be the result of those consultations, our course will be one worthy of the honour and consistent with the interests of England.

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, although my right hon. Friend has addressed the House at great length, with excellent temper, and great ability, yet his speech has served more than any other to impress this conviction on my mind—namely, that it is totally impossible for us at present to arrive at a satisfactory discussion of the question. And if I do regret his having read from the Instructions to Lord Salisbury, I do not join issue with him on the point of Order. My learning does not carry me far enough for that; but I join issue with him on the point of usage and on the point of utility. If there be a rule of this House against quoting from official Papers which are not before the House, the meaning of it is that the quotations so made cannot be checked and followed by those who hear them; and my right hon. Friend in making that quotation made one which we have no power to follow or to check. That was the reason of the objection which I ventured to take. I did not intend or propose to press it beyond that point, and my right hon. Friend, I may venture to remind him, went directly in the teeth of the admonition he himself again and again gave us—to wait for the Papers and not attempt to discuss the matter without them. For my own part, recognizing the justice of that admonition so strongly, and especially after the able speech of my noble Friend (the Marquess of Hartington), I should not have said a word to-night but for the fact that there have been several allusions made to what is called the agitation of the Autumn and to the exaggerations connected with it. In the debates which it is evident will arise on this subject, I shall be prepared to stand by every word that I have written or spoken upon it. And if the charge of exaggeration be made against me, I altogether repel and repudiate that charge. My quotations against Her Majesty's Government have consisted almost exclusively of quotations from their own speeches and writings. I grant that the accusations conveyed by those quotations have been severe, but that is not my fault; and they have not derived a colour or an addition from anything that has been said by me. But I must adhere to opinions which you may, if you please, call exaggeration. If a plan is proposed of which you disapprove, because you think it goes too far, you may apply that term to it if you choose; but though you may think a plan which you believe goes beyond the necessity of the case is unwise, that is not what is commonly meant by the word exaggeration. My right hon. Friend—and I regret it—seems to be still involved in the old labyrinth of persuasions to Turkey to set about the work of self-reform. He said that Turkey did not repel the idea of self-reform; she did not get upon the high horse, as other Powers might have done, and say she would not do it, but she was willing to entertain this, to entertain that, and to entertain the other; and my right hon. Friend thinks that that is a matter of great satisfaction. [The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER: No, no! I do not.] Then he does not think it is a matter of great satisfaction. I have misunderstood his speech, and I am glad to have been able to have removed that misapprehension, which may have entered other minds as well as my own. He quotes the words of Lord Carnarvon, and dwells on what he thinks is an important qualification when Lord Carnarvon, in a passage which did him great honour, said that what is called "the autumn agitation" would do great good, and would immensely strengthen the hands of the Government, provided the speeches and the writings were rightly understood. I accept that statement. I do not suppose any man would be responsible for the misunderstanding of his speeches and his writings, and I myself entirely decline to be held responsible for the versions given at Conservative dinners and clubs of my speeches at any of the public meetings of my countrymen, freely called together. The fair question is, what is the true construction to be put upon those speeches and the writings. I have, however, no information that would lead me to believe that such speeches and writings have been misunderstood. On the contrary, I think they have convinced the nations of Europe that the feelings of the British nation had been grossly misapprehended up to the close of the Session of Parliament. It was the language held by the Government which had brought about that misapprehension, and it was what is called "the autumn agitation"—it was the popular expression—most irregular, if you like, most undesirable I admit, and not to be resorted to except under the strongest necessity—it was that agitation which has given the Continent of Europe to understand what the real feelings of the British people are. My right hon. Friend complains of the misunderstanding of the words of Lord Derby. My right hon. Friend—I must do him the honour and justice to say—was the first Member of Her Majesty's Government, or nearly the first, who as late as the month of September acknowledged that we had a great responsibility for the condition of the subject races in European Turkey. That avowal did him honour; but during the last Session of Parliament, when the whole subject appeared to me to be exclusively in the hands of the Prime Minister and of the Foreign Secretary, never once were we able to obtain a single declaration which owned that responsibility. My right hon. Friend says we misunderstand the words of Lord Derby. I do not wish to misunderstand them or, in emphasizing them, attribute to Lord Derby what is odious or invidious. I wish to know the true natural and grammatical meaning of language. Lord Derby had said, in speaking on the subject, that the gravity of the situation arose from the weakness and apathy of the Porte in dealing with the insurrection in its earlier stages; and my right hon. Friend says that "dealing with the insurrection" means that the Porte was apathetic in removing the causes of discontent which led to the insurrection. Talk of the hair-splitting of theologians. I must say that of all the schools I have ever known I do not think there was ever any more successful than my right hon. Friend in the

interpretation of words. At any rate I venture to state what was my construction, and I say that "dealing with the insurrection" can only mean the military measures taken against the insurrection. If Lord Derby had said, "dealing with the causes of the insurrection," or "with the discontent which led to the insurrection," there would have been some cover for the interpretation of my right hon. Friend. But "dealing with the insurrection" is a phrase which I think, can only reasonably bear the meaning I have ventured to put upon it. At any rate, readers of the debates to-morrow will form their own judgment upon the matter, and will form it in deference neither to my judgment, nor to that of my right hon. Friend. I hope it will not be said there is any attempt, on my part at least, to twist language, and I do not accuse my right hon. Friend of any such thing by voluntary action; but I contend that it is a palpable paradox to apply to the words "dealing with the insurrection" the sense which my right hon. Friend has endeavoured to put upon them. Well, then, my right hon. Friend insists that there has been no change of policy on the part of Her Majesty's Government. For my own part, I must say, though I have my own opinion upon the policy and proceedings of the Government, that is not the portion of the question which interests me or which has interested me at any conjuncture of these proceedings. My desire is that what is right should be done, and in my opinion, this is without exception the most solemn question we have ever had to discuss. I will not enter into the Treaty of 1871, but this I will say—my right hon. Friend thinks that, in common with others, all Members of this House and Members of every Government are at all times perfectly aware of the exact mode in which the Provinces of the Turkish Empire are governed. I am very glad that the comprehensive mind of my right hon. Friend has been enabled to keep him stocked from year to year with the information. Such has not been the case with me. It has only been long and painful investigation that has brought me to the conclusion at which I now stand. I adhere to that which my right hon. Friend perhaps calls an exaggeration, and I affirm that no schemes of reform will be other than a delusion—a mischievous, unpardonable delusion—after so many have been experienced and detected, which recognizes and establishes what is called the independence of Turkey in the government of the revolted Provinces. It is perfectly idle to talk of the independence of Turkey in the government of these revolted Provinces, if you mean to do anything which is worthy of doing. I am bound to say—though I am not responsible in any way for the plans of the Conference; they were not my plans. They were of a different character, very complex, and full of danger, and open to much objection—but at the same time the Conference did go pretty nearly to the root of the matter. They did introduce the element of foreign authority into the government of those Provinces, thereby effectually crippling the exercise of arbitrary Turkish authority within these limits, and thereby also putting an end, so far as those Provinces are concerned, to the doctrine of the independence of Turkey. But, Sir, in these remarks, my object is not to widen the field of this controversy. I have I believe confined myself strictly to the few points which have fallen from my right hon. Friend and others, and to these I will adhere also in the few words I have yet to say. My right hon. Friend says there has been no change of policy. If it be a comfort and satisfaction to the mind of my right hon. Friend to believe this, God forbid I should grudge him one iota of that comfort. I hope, however, on the other hand, he will not grudge me the satisfaction of saying that in the present policy of Her Majesty's Government, I now recognize not all I could desire, not all that I could hope to see in the future, but certain great facts for which we formerly looked in vain. There is, in the first place, an acknowledgment of responsibility. We no longer hear that if ever there was a case for absolute non-interference, it is the case of the Sultan and his subjects, as was said by Lord Beaconsfield. We do not now hear that we have no more to do with the quarrel between the Sultan and his subjects than we have to do with any other quarrel between a Sovereign and his people, as was said by Lord Derby. All this is a gain. "There has been no change of policy!" Never mind! Those things are gone, and we shall, at all events, hear from responsible Ministers no more opinions like those—thanks in no small degree to the much-despised "autumn agitation." Then my right hon. Friend said, I think, that there had been an industrious attempt to fasten upon the Government the charge of a desire to lead the country into a war for Turkey. Now, I have heard a good deal of the most mischievous matter, which has been almost treasonably ventilated against the present Government, but I have never heard of that. What I have heard is this—that, from whatever motives, and probably from motives quite distinct from such a desire, the Government placed us in a position in which there was great danger of being led to that result. The demonstration in Besika Bay, the conversion of the squadron there into a fleet, the acceptance of the compliments paid to the Government on the assumption that this demonstration was part of a vigorous foreign policy, the knowledge that it was not to go to war with Turkey that the fleet was sent there—the construction placed upon these things as well as upon the Guildhall speech, was, not the Government had a desire to go to war with Turkey—I wish that the right hon. Gentleman opposite and other Members of the Cabinet had more fully entered into the question during the Recess than they did—not that they desired to go to war for Turkey, but that their policy had tended to place us in that position. That is a totally different charge, and one which I think my right hon. Friend will find not quite so easy to get rid of. I want to call the attention of the House, in conclusion, to one question put by the noble Lord (the Marquess of Hartington) to my right hon. Friend. He asked what was to follow the rejection by Turkey of the proposals of the Conference. My right hon. Friend answers—"That is a matter which is receiving the grave consideration of the Government." The answer is a perfectly fair one. We have, therefore, in it some elements of satisfaction. Last year we felt that no value was set upon the concert of Europe, which, as I think, was most wantonly set at nought and repudiated. That is not so now, for it is impossible to hear any man state with more clearness, force, and, I need not say, more obvious sincerity, than does my right hon. Friend, the importance he attaches to the concert of Europe. I think my right hon. Friend's answer that it was a matter of serious

of my countrymen, freely called together. The fair question is, what is the true construction to be put upon those speeches and the writings. I have, however, no information that would lead me to believe that such speeches and writings have been misunderstood. On the contrary, I think they have convinced the nations of Europe that the feelings of the British nation had been grossly misapprehended up to the close of the Session of Parliament. It was the language held by the Government which had brought about that misapprehension, and it was what is called "the autumn agitation"—it was the popular expression—most irregular, if you like, most undesirable I admit, and not to be resorted to except under the strongest necessity—it was that agitation which has given the Continent of Europe to understand what the real feelings of the British people are. My right hon. Friend complains of the misunderstanding of the words of Lord Derby. My right hon. Friend—I must do him the honour and justice to say—was the first Member of Her Majesty's Government, or nearly the first, who as late as the month of September acknowledged that we had a great responsibility for the condition of the subject races in European Turkey. That avowal did him honour; but during the last Session of Parliament, when the whole subject appeared to me to be exclusively in the hands of the Prime Minister and of the Foreign Secretary, never once were we able to obtain a single declaration which owned that responsibility. My right hon. Friend says we misunderstand the words of Lord Derby. I do not wish to misunderstand them or, in emphasizing them, attribute to Lord Derby what is odious or invidious. I wish to know the true natural and grammatical meaning of language. Lord Derby had said, in speaking on the subject, that the gravity of the situation arose from the weakness and apathy of the Porte in dealing with the insurrection in its earlier stages; and my right hon. Friend says that "dealing with the insurrection" means that the Porte was apathetic in removing the causes of discontent which led to the insurrection. Talk of the hair-splitting of theologians. I must say that of all the schools I have ever known I do not think there was ever any more successful than my right hon. Friend in the

interpretation of words. At any rate I venture to state what was my construction, and I say that "dealing with the insurrection" can only mean the military measures taken against the insurrection. If Lord Derby had said, "dealing with the causes of the insurrection," or "with the discontent which led to the insurrection," there would have been some cover for the interpretation of my right hon. Friend. But "dealing with the insurrection" is a phrase which I think, can only reasonably bear the meaning I have ventured to put upon it. At any rate, readers of the debates to-morrow will form their own judgment upon the matter, and will form it in deference neither to my judgment, nor to that of my right hon. Friend. I hope it will not be said there is any attempt, on my part at least, to twist language, and I do not accuse my right hon. Friend of any such thing by voluntary action; but I contend that it is a palpable paradox to apply to the words "dealing with the insurrection" the sense which my right hon. Friend has endeavoured to put upon them. Well, then, my right hon. Friend insists that there has been no change of policy on the part of Her Majesty's Government. For my own part, I must say, though I have my own opinion upon the policy and proceedings of the Government, that is not the portion of the question which interests me or which has interested me at any conjuncture of these proceedings. My desire is that what is right should be done, and in my opinion, this is without exception the most solemn question we have ever had to discuss. I will not enter into the Treaty of 1871, but this I will say—my right hon. Friend thinks that, in common with others, all Members of this House and Members of every Government are at all times perfectly aware of the exact mode in which the Provinces of the Turkish Empire are governed. I am very glad that the comprehensive mind of my right hon. Friend has been enabled to keep him stocked from year to year with the information. Such has not been the case with me. It has only been long and painful investigation that has brought me to the conclusion at which I now stand. I adhere to that which my right hon. Friend perhaps calls an exaggeration, and I affirm that no schemes of reform will be other than a delusion—a mischievous, unpardonable

delusion—after so many have been experienced and detected, which recognizes and establishes what is called the independence of Turkey in the government of the revolted Provinces. It is perfectly idle to talk of the independence of Turkey in the government of these revolted Provinces, if you mean to do anything which is worthy of doing. I am bound to say—though I am not responsible in any way for the plans of the Conference; they were not my plans. They were of a different character, very complex, and full of danger, and open to much objection—but at the same time the Conference did go pretty nearly to the root of the matter. They did introduce the element of foreign authority into the government of those Provinces, thereby effectually crippling the exercise of arbitrary Turkish authority within these limits, and thereby also putting an end, so far as those Provinces are concerned, to the doctrine of the independence of Turkey. But, Sir, in these remarks, my object is not to widen the field of this controversy. I have I believe confined myself strictly to the few points which have fallen from my right hon. Friend and others, and to these I will adhere also in the few words I have yet to say. My right hon. Friend says there has been no change of policy. If it be a comfort and satisfaction to the mind of my right hon. Friend to believe this, God forbid I should grudge him one iota of that comfort. I hope, however, on the other hand, he will not grudge me the satisfaction of saying that in the present policy of Her Majesty's Government, I now recognize not all I could desire, not all that I could hope to see in the future, but certain great facts for which we formerly looked in vain. There is, in the first place, an acknowledgment of responsibility. We no longer hear that if ever there was a case for absolute non-interference, it is the case of the Sultan and his subjects, as was said by Lord Beaconsfield. We do not now hear that we have no more to do with the quarrel between the Sultan and his subjects than we have to do with any other quarrel between a Sovereign and his people, as was said by Lord Derby. All this is a gain. "There has been no change of policy!" Never mind! Those things are gone, and we shall, at all events, hear from responsible Ministers no more opinions like those—thanks

in no small degree to the much-despised "autumn agitation." Then my right hon. Friend said, I think, that there had been an industrious attempt to fasten upon the Government the charge of a desire to lead the country into a war for Turkey. Now, I have heard a good deal of the most mischievous matter, which has been almost treasonably ventilated against the present Government, but I have never heard of that. What I have heard is this—that, from whatever motives, and probably from motives quite distinct from such a desire, the Government placed us in a position in which there was great danger of being led to that result. The demonstration in Besika Bay, the conversion of the squadron there into a fleet, the acceptance of the compliments paid to the Government on the assumption that this demonstration was part of a vigorous foreign policy, the knowledge that it was not to go to war with Turkey that the fleet was sent there—the construction placed upon these things as well as upon the Guildhall speech, was, not the Government had a desire to go to war with Turkey—I wish that the right hon. Gentleman opposite and other Members of the Cabinet had more fully entered into the question during the Recess than they did—not that they desired to go to war for Turkey, but that their policy had tended to place us in that position. That is a totally different charge, and one which I think my right hon. Friend will find not quite so easy to get rid of. I want to call the attention of the House, in conclusion, to one question put by the noble Lord (the Marquess of Hartington) to my right hon. Friend. He asked what was to follow the rejection by Turkey of the proposals of the Conference. My right hon. Friend answers—"That is a matter which is receiving the grave consideration of the Government." The answer is a perfectly fair one. We have, therefore, in it some elements of satisfaction. Last year we felt that no value was set upon the concert of Europe, which, as I think, was most wantonly set at nought and repudiated. That is not so now, for it is impossible to hear any man state with more clearness, force, and, I need not say, more obvious sincerity, than does my right hon. Friend, the importance he attaches to the concert of Europe. I think my right hon. Friend's answer that it was a matter of serious

of my countrymen, freely called together. The fair question is, what is the true construction to be put upon those speeches and the writings. I have, however, no information that would lead me to believe that such speeches and writings have been misunderstood. On the contrary, I think they have convinced the nations of Europe that the feelings of the British nation had been grossly misapprehended up to the close of the Session of Parliament. It was the language held by the Government which had brought about that misapprehension, and it was what is called "the autumn agitation"—it was the popular expression—most irregular, if you like, most undesirable I admit, and not to be resorted to except under the strongest necessity—it was that agitation which has given the Continent of Europe to understand what the real feelings of the British people are. The answer is a perfectly fair one. We have, therefore, in it some elements of satisfaction. Last year we felt that no value was set upon the concert of Europe, which, as I think, was most wantonly set at nought and repudiated. That is not so now, for it is impossible to hear any man state with more clearness, force, and, I need not say, more obvious sincerity, than does my right hon. Friend, the importance he attaches to the concert of Europe. I think my right hon. Friend's answer that it was a matter of serious consideration to the Government, an answer which I am bound absolutely to accept, and at the present moment I will not attempt to press him or Her Majesty's Government in the slightest degree upon the matter. But my right hon. Friend said there were two other things—that separate intervention would be suspect—and I cannot deny that it would be a serious evil; and also that the Government were not prepared to resort to coercion. My right hon. Friend's answer on the last point was not quite clear. He did not say that the Government were not prepared to join Europe in either the use, or the application of force. I will not enter into this question now. I only want to point out that when he said he was not prepared to resort to coercion, it remained a little ambiguous whether it was on the part of England alone, or whether my right hon. Friend meant the phrase to apply to common as well as separate coercion. We shall, however, approach this subject to greater advantage at a future date. My right hon. Friend said, and I have to thank him for it, that he could not put the smallest faith in the Turkish Constitution. That is one of the statements which I recall with real gratitude, and I must own that there is no portion of his speech with which I am less disposed to quarrel than the cordial eulogy he passed upon the conduct of Lord Salisbury. I think that Lord Salisbury has acted as an able, honourable English Gentleman, with a manly mind, and has done at the Conference the utmost that was possible under the circumstances. If I may distinguish between the words of Lord Salisbury those which seem to me entitled to special honour, I choose that passage in which he stated that if the Porte should refuse the proposals of the Powers, the position of the Turks would have undergone a complete change in the face of Europe. That is a most important declaration, and at the proper time I shall be prepared to argue that Turkey has placed herself entirely outside the Treaty of 1856 by her total, hopeless, and absolute disregard of the solemn stipulation which she entered into. I think this is the meaning, and the only meaning, of Lord Salisbury's words, for otherwise I do not see how the position of Turkey could have undergone a complete change in the face of Europe. My right hon. Friend also said that my noble Friend (the Marquess of Hartington) had drawn a distinction between the country and the Government, and that if he did draw such a distinction, it was his duty to take the earliest possible measure for putting that matter to the test. I am not entitled to speak for my noble Friend, but I should like to know in what way it is in the power of my noble Friend to do so. Would it be by a Vote of Want of Confidence in the House of Commons? I suppose it may be said that the House of Commons represents the country; but still it is not the country, and, as people have lately drawn a distinction between the country and the Government, so there might be circumstances in which they might draw a distinction between the country and the House of Commons. My right hon. Friend was so kind, and at the same time so urgent in pressing the noble Lord to test the question of the distinction between the country and the Government, that perhaps he will be inclined to give him some practical assistance in the matter. If he is in that disposition, I will venture to say he has the power, together with those with whom he sits, of raising the question and bringing it to a final issue by giving certain advice to Her Majesty which she could follow. I am merely acting as a mediator. It appears to me that that is the only way in which the matter can be tested. I am sure my right hon. Friend opposite is sincere in wishing it to be tested, and I venture, therefore, to point out to him that it is in his power to do it. There is another question which I do not think my right hon. Friend answered very distinctly; but perhaps the answer will be contained in the Papers. The question is, as to the steps which had been or were to be taken in order to give effect to Lord Derby's despatch of September 21. A third question which I think my right hon. Friend also forgot to notice is whether with reference to the departure of the Ambassadors, the withdrawal took place to mark the displeasure of the Governments at the refusal of the proposals of the Conference, and I should add this—whether, if it was so understood, the language held by Sir Henry Elliot was consistent with the interpretation which is thus proposed to be assigned to it.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY: I so entirely concur with the right hon. Gentleman in his original statement that this is not a good opportunity for discussing the question in its details, that I shall certainly not follow him through those points into which he has gone on the present occasion. At the same time I wish most distinctly to state that the Government are not at all disposed to concede any of the points as to their want of consistency, or as to the misinterpretation of their motives, or as to the interpretation which the right hon. Gentleman himself may put on his own writings and speeches, and which may be very different from the interpretation put upon them by others. I will answer the two questions which the right hon. Gentleman has put last. He will find in the Papers which are to be laid upon the Table this evening, a very full account of what was done by Lord Derby with respect to the despatch of September 21, and how it was pressed on the attention of the Porte. As to what was meant by the withdrawal of our Ambassador, I would much rather have it judged, not by a short answer of mine, but by the proceedings which were taken and by the voluminous despatches which will be found there. The right hon. Gentleman good-humouredly advises us to take an example from him, and I have no doubt he hopes with the same result. We are, however, entirely satisfied that this Parliament may be taken, as well as the Government, to represent the country in the negotiations which have recently taken place.

IRELAND—SUNDAY CLOSING OF PUBLIC HOUSES.—QUESTION.

MR. O'CLERY asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland, If it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government, having regard to the decisive majority of the House last Session, to introduce a Bill dealing with the question of the closing of public houses in Ireland on Sunday?

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH: Sir, in the first place, I may remind the hon. Member that Notice has already been given by my hon. and learned Friend the Solicitor General for Ireland and myself of the introduction of three important Irish Bills, dealing with subjects on which early legislation has for a long time past seemed to the Government necessary, and that the time at the disposal of the Government in this House is limited. In the second place, I observe that the hon. Member for Derry (Mr. R. Smyth) has already given Notice of his intention to introduce a Bill on this subject; and I see no reason why the Government should attempt to take it out of his hands. The Government have already shown their respect to the decision of the House to which reference has been made by their action last Session with regard to the Bill of the hon. Member for county Derry. They are prepared to adopt a similar course this year; but I shall hope by some means or other to obtain a more favourable opportunity than then presented itself for placing fully before the House the information from which it appeared advisable to the Government that the measure of the hon. Member for Derry should not be brought into full effect in the large towns of Ireland.

INDIA—KHELAT—AFGHANISTAN.

QUESTIONS.

MR. GRANT DUFF asked the Under Secretary of State for India, What number of troops the Indian Government has at present within the dominions of the Khan of Khelat, where they are stationed, and on what duties they are employed; and, whether any arrangements have been come to with the Ameer of Afghanistan for the residence of a European servant of the Indian Government at Herat or at any other place within Afghan territory?

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON: Sir, so far as we know, the only troops at present within the territories of the Khan of Khelat are the escort sent with Major Sandeman, who was deputed by the late Viceroy to settle the disputes between the Khan and his Sirdars, and arrange for the undisturbed passage of caravans through the Bolan Pass. Major Sandeman remains in Khelat territory at the request of the Khan.

MR. GRANT DUFF: What is the number of the troops?

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON: I believe somewhat under 1,000 men.

MR. GRANT DUFF: Where are they stationed?

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON: I am not certain where they are at the present moment. They will no doubt move about the country as circumstances require.

NAVY — OFFICERS OF THE ROYAL MARINES AND ENGINEER DEPARTMENT.—QUESTION.

MR. GORST asked the First Lord of the Admiralty, Whether any measures have yet been adopted by the Government for improving the position of the Officers of the Royal Marines and of the Engineer Department of the Royal Navy?

MR. HUNT, in reply, said, that neither the Marine nor Engineer officers had been forgotten by Her Majesty's Government, and he purposed when moving the Navy Estimates to state what had been done in reference to them.

BRITISH SUBJECTS IN FOREIGN SERVICE.—QUESTION.

MR. O'REILLY asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether there are at present any person or persons in the service of the Crown, or other British subjects serving, with the permission of the Crown in the naval or military forces of Turkey; whether Her Majesty's Government have considered the question of withdrawing such permission; and, whether any such permission will be granted in future?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER, in reply, said, that there were at present two officers who were formerly in the service of the Crown in the service of Turkey, and three in that of Egypt. Those in the Turkish service were the Hon. Captain Hobart and Retired Naval Lieutenant Woods; while those in the service of Egypt were Retired Captain M'Killop, Retired Commander George Morris, and Retired Major James Morris, of the Royal Marines. No person in the military service of the Crown had permission to serve in the naval or military services of Egypt or Turkey. No question had been raised as to the withdrawal of the permission which had been given to the naval officers in question, and with regard to the future, it was impossible for the Government to give any information as to details.

PUBLIC HEALTH — PURE VACCINE LYMPH.—QUESTION.

SIR TREVOR LAWRENCE asked the President of the Local Government Board, Whether, having regard to the severity of the present epidemic of small pox, the urgent necessity of providing facilities for vaccination in its most efficient form, and the prejudices which, however unreasonable, exist in some parts against vaccination from arm to arm, he will take steps to provide a supply of vaccine lymph from the calf for such public vaccinators as may require it, as is done in Belgium?

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH: In reply to my hon. Friend, Sir, I can assure him that the subject of vaccination from the calf has not been overlooked by Her Majesty's Government. The practice, as pursued in Belgium and other countries, was investigated personally by the present Medical Officer of Health of the Local Government Board. The results of that inquiry will be found in the 12th annual Report of the Medical Officer of the Privy Council, and they were not favourable to the adoption of the practice. Subsequent experiences of it have been of a conflicting character. The subject is now attracting attention in the country, and will not be lost sight of by the Local Government Board.

SOLDIERS IN SKATING RINKS — UNIFORM.—QUESTION.

COLONEL KENNARD asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether his attention has been called to a letter which appeared in the "Standard" of the 2nd of February, signed by a Royal Engineer, relating the circumstances under which he, a soldier wearing Her Majesty's uniform, was expelled on that account from the Luton Skating Rink (Bedfordshire); and whether steps, if any, could be taken to prevent the repetition of any such similar occurrence at places of public resort?

MR. GATHORNE HARDY: Sir, in reply to the Question of the hon. and gallant Member, I have to say that my attention was drawn by his Question to the letter which appeared in the Standard newspaper, which I find is anonymous, being signed "A Royal Engineer," and that I have no means of ascertaining whether the circumstances stated in the letter are correct. I may observe that the Government have no power to prevent institutions of this kind from making such bye-laws and regulations as they may think fit; though, at the same time, I much regret that any slight should have been offered to Her Majesty's uniform.

NAVY — H.M.S. "NEWCASTLE" — LOSS OF LIFE.—QUESTION.

MR. HANBURY-TRACY asked the First Lord of the Admiralty, Whether his attention has been called to an article in the "Army and Navy Gazette" of February 3 entitled "Left to Die," in which the Captain of H.M.S. "Newcastle" is stated not to have taken sufficient steps to rescue the lives of Mr. Wingfield, midshipman, and two able seamen who had gallantly jumped overboard to save a man from drowning; whether he is able to contradict the statement there made—

"That in one short hour after the man fell overboard, before she had sighted the men or the life-buoy, the boat was recalled, and the ship stood away. That the Commander begged the Captain to 'beat up' to the spot where the men were likely to be still battling for life, but that the Captain declined to do so. That throughout the ship and the squadron there is a most painful impression that either from apathy, want of presence of mind, or absence of resource, these gallant fellows were left to die."

And, whether a court of inquiry has been held to investigate into all the circumstances of the case; and, if not, whether, in justice to the Captain and the honour of the Naval Service, he will give directions to hold one forthwith?

MR. HUNT: Sir, I have read the article to which the Question of the hon. Gentleman refers; but I am unable

at the present moment either to confirm, or to contradict the facts set forth in it. I am sorry, however, to say that it is correct in the main fact that an unfortunate loss of life occurred on the occasion to which it alludes. I have received the following extract from a Report, dated 18th December, 1876, from the Captain of H.M.S. Newcastle to Rear Admiral Lambert, commanding the Detached Squadron to which his vessel belongs:—

"At about 2.50 p.m. yesterday (December 13) Mr. Wingfield, midshipman, had hove the log, when William Miles stepped on the lower half of the starboard quarter port for the purpose of snatching the log line, when he slipped and fell overboard, Mr. Wingfield jumping after him. The life buoy was immediately let go, and the ship brought to the wind on the port tack. She was running with single reefed topsails, and both courses, between 8 and 9 knots, with a very nasty, irregular sea. The lifeboat was at once cleared and lowered, and signalmen and look-out men were placed aloft in the mizen top, rigging, and topmast crosstrees to look out, but before the cutter was clear of the ship Myles was observed to throw his arms up, and Mr. Wingfield struggling to support him, when both were lost sight of. In the meantime, Robert Heak, A.B., and George Reed, A.B., had jumped from the quarter of the ship, and both were observed making for the life buoy, but disappeared before they succeeded in reaching it, and I grieve to say were never again seen on the surface. The lifeboat (first cutter) was ordered to pull on the bearings for the men, but she failed, after some time in looking about, to discover anything of them, when I reluctantly, after an hour's unsuccessful search, ordered the recall to be hoisted. The boat was clear of the ship in about three minutes from the time the alarm was given."

Since receiving the Report I have not been able to communicate with the Squadron, which is now under orders for home, so that I am unable to say whether the Admiral has ordered an inquiry into the matter. If he has not done so, I shall certainly cause inquiry to be made, so that the full particulars may be elicited.

LORD CHAMBERLAIN'S DEPARTMENT —FIRES IN PLACES OF AMUSEMENT.

QUESTION.

SIR WILLIAM FRASER asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether, should he consider the power of the Lord Chamberlain inadequate, he will, by increasing or altering such power, provide for the security of the public visiting places of public amusement?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS, in reply, said, that the Lord Chamberlain had been in communication with the Home Office on the subject for some time; but that it being found necessary to take the opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown on the point, no steps had yet been taken in the matter. The question, however, was under consideration, their opinion on the case having just been received.

STORAGE AND CONVEYANCE OF WATER.—QUESTION.

MR. WHALLEY asked the President of the Local Government Board, Whether it is his intention to introduce a Bill for affording facilities for the storage and conveyance of water, pursuant to the recommendation of the Commission in their Sixth Report on the Pollution of Rivers and Domestic Water Supply?

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH: I presume, Sir, the recommendation to which the hon. Gentleman alludes is "that the owners of land should be permitted to include the cost of village water supply among those expenses which they are now enabled to charge on their estates, with consent of the Improvement Commissioners."

Taken by itself this would hardly be for me to initiate, but taken in connection with another well-known recommendation of the Sanitary Commission, it would become of considerable importance. Having regard, however, to the amendments in the law which were effected in the Public Health Act of 1875, I am not prepared at this moment to introduce any Bill having the limited object suggested by the hon. Gentleman.

THE ADDRESS IN ANSWER TO THE QUEEN'S SPEECH.

Report of Address brought up, and read.

MR. GRANT DUFF: Sir, before the Report is agreed to, I wish to call attention to an omission in Her Majesty's gracious Speech, which is, I think, very unfortunate. We were told of the famine in Southern India; we were told of the Delhi pageant; but no allusion whatever was made to the astounding calamity which destroyed a vast number of Her Majesty's subjects close to the capital of Her Majesty's Eastern Dominions. The noble Lord the Mover of the Address (Viscount Galway), guided, I think, by a happier inspiration than that under which the Cabinet settled the details of the Royal Speech, did allude to the sad event, but surely the Speech itself should have made some mention of it, especially as it was the first Royal Speech delivered since the proclamation of the Imperial Title. An hon. Member addressing his constituents in a town of Northern England the other day referred to the curious manner in which we pass over with little remark occurrences of great importance in distant parts of Her Majesty's dominions, and he used an extremely happy illustration. If, he said, a storm takes place on our coast, and 30 men go down at the mouth of the Tyne, there is a great and general excitement; but now 250,000 persons have been destroyed in India in one moment, just as if the whole population of the county of Northumberland had been swept into the sea. That I thought a striking illustration when I read it, and I confess I did not expect so soon to meet with so startling a confirmation of the truth which the hon. Member was enforcing. I hope the right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the House will be able to tell us that it was not forgetfulness, but some sufficient and explicable, though not obvious reason which excluded allusion to such a tragedy from the gracious Speech of yesterday. Surely to have said one kind word about it would have been very agreeable to Her Majesty's own feelings, and to show that India has its fair, though not more than its fair, place in the thoughts of its Ruler would, I cannot help thinking, do more to attach the inhabitants of that country to the Throne than much burning of powder in salutes, or the congregating of any number of elephants amongst the ruined cities which surround the present Delhi, and whose fallen magnificence must, in the eyes of some of the observers have given a touch of grim irony to the Imperial display. I the more regret that this terrible visitation has been left without mention, because it fell chiefly upon the peasantry, and because of late the tendency—the result, I trust, of accidental circumstances—has been, I think, to bring the Princes and Potentates of the Peninsula a little too prominently into relief at the expense both of the humbler and would remind the hon. Member for Peterborough (Mr. Whalley) that a Committee had reported two or three years ago that it should be compulsory on the magistrates to appoint Roman Catholic clergymen where a certain number of Catholic prisoners were confined, and that a Bill had been introduced in the House of Lords founded on that Report and passed without challenge, and was read a second time in this House, but was at last referred to that basket where the Innocents were destroyed.

SIR HARCOURT JOHNSTONE asked when the Bill would be in the hands of hon. Members?

MR. MUNDELLA said, he did not gather from the right hon. Gentleman's statement whether he took powers under the Bill to control prison labour. It was to the interest of the prisoners that when they left prison they should be in possession of some handicraft whereby they could have recourse to honest labour when they were discharged.

DR. KENEALY: I regret that the right hon. Gentleman has not made better provision for the internal regulation and management of prisons. I believe that in nearly all our prisons a vast amount of moral and physical torture is inflicted on prisoners that was never contemplated by law. A prisoner who makes any complaint never receives any redress for his grievance, although there is a pretence of a tribunal that will hear him. The right hon. Gentleman will remember that when complaints were made some time ago, with reference to the treatment of the Fenian prisoners, the Home Office for a long time was deaf, but was at length constrained by public opinion to grant an inquiry into those complaints. A Commission and Commissioners were appointed, and evidence was taken, and a Report published; but I am informed that the whole Irish people did not heed that Report, and that they still believe that the complaints were well founded. These observations are preliminary to my mention of a name which in this House, I am sorry to say, is always received with laughter, with mockery, and with scorn, but which, in the homes of hundreds of thousands of the people of this country, is never mentioned without exciting the deepest sympathy and sorrow. I have seen strong men shed tears, and women weep, even to hysterics, when they remembered—what they, at all events, considered to be—the enormities of the Tichborne Trial. I bring forward this subject, not in the interests of that unfortunate man alone, but in those of humanity; and in these interests I hope I shall be heard. I hold in my hand the copies of letters which have been written by two gentlemen, Messrs. Onslow and Helsby, who recently visited the prisoner in Dartmoor. The treatment and condition of that unhappy gentleman must awaken the sympathies of all persons who are really Christian men. I do not care whether they be Ortonites or Tichbornites; or how strongly they may feel against him; but I ask all in the name of humanity and common Christian charity to listen to the accounts given by these gentlemen, accounts which outdo in horror anything that we read of in foreign prisons. Mr. Onslow visited Sir Roger Tichborne in November last, and he thus describes the interview—

“After waiting some twenty minutes in the lodge, we were beckoned to by a warder who conducted us down a yard, and told us to wait in a stone recess about three feet square, where we were speedily locked in. We observed in front of us, behind some gigantic iron bars, a similar recess, and then again another, like a wild beast's cage, into which was ushered the best abused man in England.”

Now, here, Sir, I beg leave to ask, of what possible use, except to inflict cruel and unnecessary torture, it could be to immure persons behind iron bars of this description? It could not be for purposes of security, for precautions to the full are taken to secure that. When I was in Dartmoor with Mr. Onslow I learned that the warders who see to the prisoners have always their guns loaded, with orders to fire and kill them if they attempt to escape. It cannot therefore be against the risk of this, that prisoners are treated in this manner; and how harrowing it must be to the feelings of their friends or relatives, their wives or mothers or sisters, to see them exhibited “like wild beasts.” Mr. Onslow goes on—

“The warder occupied the centre compartment with watch in hand, keeping a vigilant eye on the minutes as they rapidly flew by, when he informed us ‘time was up and we must go.’ The poor prisoner expressed his pleasure at seeing us, and declared, with tears in his eyes, he had seen no one, or exchanged a single word with any one, since we last had met in May. I never saw him so utterly and completely broken-hearted with a face oh! so aged, he looked seventy; the iron had entered into his soul. He complained most bitterly at the cruel and malignant manner he had been treated by the authorities of the prison, and in feeble words choked with tears he implored us to convey to Dr. Kenealy his earnest desire that he should move in the House of Commons for an enquiry into the causes of the shameful treatment which he had experienced; he absolutely cried for justice, and was about to relate the cruelties he had suffered, when the warder intervened and informed him it was contrary to the rules of the prison to touch on those topics. But we saw quite enough to assure us that something dreadful had occurred that had wounded his feelings to the quick."

Now, Sir, I beg respectfully to call the right hon. Gentleman's attention to this matter; and I hope that in his present Bill he will provide anew for it. I hope his iron-barred dungeons will not be preserved; they can have no other object than to infuse misery into the soul of the prisoner. So, too, it appears that by the prison rules—and I am afraid that the right hon. Gentleman's Bill does not contemplate any alteration of these rules—if a prisoner's father or mother visits him, he is not allowed to give to that beloved relative any account whatever of the treatment which he receives from the prison authorities. I call that a very great grievance. I call it a grievous hardship for any man's mouth to be sealed up in that way: but no matter what insolence or tyranny he may have been subjected to in prison, he is absolutely forbidden to give any information to those persons who might bring it before the public, so that inquiry might be made, and the grievances, if true, be redressed. I ask the right hon. Gentleman's particular attention to what I am now going to read. If it be true, as suggested here, it is one of the greatest scandals.

MR. WHALLEY: I rise to Order. I wish to call attention to the fact that during the statement of the hon. Member for Stoke—a statement which I will not believe; if I did, I should deem it no satisfaction to sit in this House amongst the Gentlemen around me who are laughing at it; but it is at least worthy of attention, and is most harrowing to the minds of those men who listen to it—the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Cross) has been deliberately occupying himself by speaking to the hon. Member by his side.

MR. SPEAKER: I understood the hon. Member to rise to a point of Order. He has not stated the point of Order.

MR. WHALLEY: I beg pardon. It is intended to attract the right hon. Gentleman's attention to what I think concerns the honour of this country.

DR. KENEALY: Sir, I have made no complaint. I am bound, in justice to the right hon. Gentleman, to say that whenever I have called his attention, as I have already, to any particular portion of this letter, he has listened. The passage which I now read has not been suggested by the prisoner, because, as we have already seen, he was forbidden to complain; but it is the common talk at Dartmoor and the neighbourhood, and has probably its foundation in what the prison warders have themselves said—

"Report says he has been subjected to the indecent inspection of his person for mere motives of curiosity to see the malformation which undoubtedly existed in Mr. Roger Tichborne; whether this report is true or not I cannot say, but we heard sufficient from the Claimant himself to show us that an immediate inquiry is necessary."

Sir, I can only say that if this horrible story be true, and if the prisoner has been, indeed, subjected to this indecent treatment, that it is the incumbent duty of the right hon. Gentleman to make immediate inquiry; and if he finds it to be true, I hope he will visit it with his marked displeasure. Mr. Onslow continued—

"The miserable and wretched box we were forced to stand in for twenty minutes was a disgrace to a civilized country; the dungeons of Spielberg, and the strangers' room in the vaults of the convict prisons of Naples, were comfortable in comparison, and what a contrast to the kindness and civility which we have always experienced at the hands of the late governor of the gaol, Major North, who always placed his private room at our disposal on every occasion of our former visits. It was so dark in this detestable and abominable place I could scarcely see to read out the questions I had taken the precaution to write."

Sir, the right hon. Gentleman must know whether or not this is a true description of those particular dungeons in Dartmoor in which prisoners are exhibited. I say that no man, no matter what crime he may have committed, ought in this England of ours, which affects to be so free, and professes to be so civilized and humane, to be shown to any of the outside world in dungeons of this description. I do not see the right

hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich in his place; but I remember how he excited the anger, the indignation, and the sympathy of the whole country when, some years ago, he published a volume describing the atrocities that were perpetrated in the Neapolitan dungeons under the late Monarchy: but I say that there is nothing in Mr. Gladstone's volume, and nothing that the Italian lawyer, Poerio, fled from, that was a greater disgrace to a civilized and professedly Christian country than dungeons such as those that Mr. Onslow described existing among ourselves. It might be said that Mr. Onslow was a man of sanguine temperament; and that he probably saw things under the influence of an over-heated fancy, but his statement was fully corroborated by Mr. Helsby, who accompanied him. Now, I know Mr. Helsby, and I can say that a man of more clear, calm, and collected judgment England does not possess; or one less likely to exaggerate in the least what he saw. And thus Mr. Helsby describes this painful scene—

"We entered the prison about 2 o'clock, Mr. Onslow giving our names to the authorities, but it seems that both the governor and deputy governor were absent. After waiting several minutes we were introduced into a sort of cage and the door closed on us; there was barely room for the three to stand abreast of each other in front of the iron bars which faced us, nearly as thick as one's wrist; then came a passage into which entered the warder by another door; beyond the warder another row of thick iron bars, and beyond that, as it were in another cage, Tichborne was shown like a wild beast in a menagerie; as he stood leaning with his arms on the stone wall that supported the iron bars, his face was illuminated from a small window on his right hand side, this being the only light in either of the compartments. I did not remove my eyes from him during the time Mr. Onslow asked and received answers to sundry questions—excepting to glance occasionally at the warder, who stood with his watch in hand during the twenty minutes this painful interview lasted—when he had finished I read a message from his wife, who denied ever having been near the prison with little Roger, or making any attempt to get permission from the authorities to do so. He was much affected when I told him that I had kissed his children for him before leaving home. Tichborne is slightly stouter than when I saw him in November last year, but he looks considerably older. I observed that his neck was much swollen, and a number of sores or ulcers round his throat—one on the right hand side appearing to be about the size of a sixpence. I have no doubt at all that he is being cruelly treated by his task-masters—and he would have told us all particulars, if he had been free to speak—but the warder prevented it, and informed him that it was against the rule of the prison to make any communication. He replied that he would not and did not wish to break any rules; and so confined himself to imploring and beseeching us in strong and earnest tones to ask Dr. Kenealy or some other kind friend to move the House of Commons for a Commission of Inquiry into the matter. From the nature of the various rumours current in Plymouth, coupled with the prisoner's protestations, the request is nothing but a reasonable and just one, as I am quite sure that he would not complain without good grounds. Although the enemies of this unfortunate man have placed him beyond the pale of the law, they have no right to attempt to put him beyond the pale of humanity. We besought him to have courage and to place confidence and faith in God—that we represented the feeling and sympathy of countless thousands of true-hearted Englishmen and women, who would never abandon him or his cause; he seemed to quite understand that, and expressed his gratitude, but at the same time he is of opinion that he is in his living tomb—'For you may depend upon it,' he said, 'that after spending so many hundreds of thousands of pounds by the Government to get me here, they never intended to let me out again.'"

Sir, I must ask the House whether this is not perfectly dreadful? Was it ever contemplated by the Legislature that prisoners sentenced to servitude were to be thus shown covered with sores and ulcers? If the great philanthropist of the last century, Howard, were now alive, and were to visit Dartmoor, in what burning language he would put forth the indignation of his soul at scenes like this!—language that would produce such an effect, that the right hon. Gentleman, even with his powerful majority, would have to yield to, and abandon the maintenance of such an institution. With the greatest respect for the right hon. Gentleman, and confidence in his spirit of justice, which I hope is not destroyed by his being a Cabinet Minister, I put it to him, whether he will not, for the sake—for the honour of our common country, in the interests of common humanity also, do something by his Prisons Bill to prevent the possibility of recurrences of this kind. I believe, from all I have heard, that they are substantially true: and I again entreat the right hon. Gentleman to make such provision in his Bill as will effectually prevent its being in the power of bad and cruel-hearted men—for such are sometimes appointed under Governments—to render the life of a prisoner a perfect hell upon earth.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS, in reply, said, he hoped the Bill would be in the hands of hon. Members to-morrow morning, or on Monday at the latest. With regard to the question put by the hon. Member for Sheffield (Mr. Mundella), the whole question of prison discipline was carefully discussed in 1865, and certain rules and regulations were then laid down. He had not interfered with the Act of 1865, except to this extent—that whereas at present the very stringent terms of that Act with regard to penal labour could not be relaxed under a period of three months, he had taken power to have them relaxed after one month, if the conduct of the prisoner would warrant such relaxation. With regard to the question of industrial labour interfering with the smaller trades throughout the country, that was a question which had been for some time under his most careful consideration. He had been in communication personally with gentlemen who were well acquainted with the subject, and he hoped to be able to put the matter on a satisfactory footing—at all events, when all the gaols were in one hand—by taking care that the employment was of a sufficiently varied character and by inducing Government to adopt the judicious course of supplying its own wants, as far as possible, by means of prison labour. The making of clothing for the Metropolitan Police had been carried on in some of the prisons with great advantage, and, in connection with labour of this sort, there was the satisfaction of knowing that the prisoners engaged in it were learning a trade which they would be able easily to carry on when they were set at liberty. With regard to what the hon. Member for Stoke (Dr. Kenealy) had said as to the treatment of a particular prisoner, he could only say that no complaint of the kind had ever reached him, and that he did not think it possible such a complaint could be true. With regard to the cell accommodation in convict and county and borough prisons, he could honestly say that the cells were kept thoroughly warm and well ventilated, and, as far as places of that kind could be, they were comfortable and provided with everything that was necessary. He rather gathered from the hon. Member that Mr. Onslow found fault, not with the cells in which the prisoners were confined, but with the places in which they were allowed to see their friends and those who visited them. Dartmoor, he (Mr. Assheton Cross) was sorry to say, was one of the prisons he had not yet personally visited, and, therefore, he was not able to say what was the fact as to the bars which had been mentioned. He would, however, remind the House that the character of the persons ordinarily confined in convict prisons was such that it was absolutely necessary to have them separated from their visitors in such a manner as to prevent the latter from passing to them tools with which they might effect their escape, or any other articles of an improper character. He would, however, make inquiry as to Dartmoor, and hoped to be able to show that there had been nothing unusual in the treatment of the prisoner mentioned by the hon. Member. The prisoner in question had undoubtedly had the advantage of every medical advice that could be given, and extra food and comforts had been more than once allowed him. He could assure the hon. Member that nothing would induce him (Mr. Assheton Cross) for one moment to allow that particular prisoner, or any prisoner, to be treated in any harsh manner, or in any manner different from that in which other prisoners were treated; and if he found the rules of the prison had been disregarded in that respect the offenders should be visited with his severe displeasure. He would also remind the hon. Member that the visiting justices who would go round to the gaols from time to time would have the fullest opportunity of hearing any complaints which might be made, and of setting matters right if those complaints were well founded. He deeply regretted that he differed from the hon. Member for North Warwickshire (Mr. Newdegate) on this point. The objection of the hon. Member was similar to the one he made to the Act of 1865; but no one who compared the state of the prisons then with their condition now would find that the centralization, which undoubtedly existed under the present law, had produced any evil effect on the country. He relied most confidently upon the assistance of the local visiting justices to carry out the Bill, which he now asked permission to introduce.

Motion agreed to.

Bill to amend the Law relating to Prisons in England, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Secretary Cross and Sir HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON.

LEAVE. FIRST READING.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY, in moving for leave to bring in a Bill to make further provision respecting the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge and the Colleges therein, said, he would not detain the House by entering into the details of the measure. Last year there had been some difficulty in regulating the order of debate in consequence of the desire shown by both Oxford and Cambridge men to address the House on the subject, which was dealt with in two separate measures. To obviate that inconvenience he had deemed it better to combine both Bills in one, and it was in that shape he intended to introduce the proposals of the Government this Session.

MR. BERESFORD HOPE said, that last year he welcomed with great pleasure the fact that the two Universities were treated in two Bills, because, as a Cambridge man, he could not help seeing how that University had often been put at a disadvantage, both in that House and elsewhere, by the idea of dealing with it as a duplicate Oxford. Oxford produced politicians, and Cambridge Judges, and so in Parliament the former was apt to have more than its due influence. It was forgotten that they were independent in their origin, their traditions, their constitution, and their means of working. Because there had been two Bills the claims of the two Universities were, last Session, well put before Parliament. He trusted that any provision affecting either Oxford or Cambridge which might be adopted would not therefore be taken for granted in the case of the other as analogous in its application. With that protest in favour of fair play and of sufficient consideration for the University of Cambridge, he could only now express his fervent hope that as there was considerable discussion last year the House would deal with this Bill with all possible speed.

MR. OSBORNE MORGAN asked whether the Commissioners named in the Bills of last Session were the same as it was now proposed to appoint, and if not, whether the Bill, when printed, would contain the names of the new Commissioners?

MR. LYON PLAYFAIR wished to know whether, as the House was now informed that there was to be but one Bill, there would be two separate Commissions for the Universities or only one National Commission?

MR. STAVELEY HILL asked when the Bill would be in the hands of hon. Members?

MR. GATHORNE HARDY, in reply, trusted that, with the assistance of the Cambridge statesmen and Oxford politicians, both Universities would have their due honour, and that the provisions for the two Universities should be separately maintained, so far as was necessary. With respect to the Commissioners, they would not be altogether the same, but their names would appear in the Bill. There would not be a National Commission, but two separate Commissions, as proposed last year. There had been a little delay in printing the Bill, owing to the absence of Lord Salisbury, and he could not say exactly when it would be ready. He hoped to take the second reading on Monday week.

Motion agreed to.

Bill to make further provision respecting the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge, and the Colleges therein, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Secretary HARDY, Mr. Secretary CROSS, and Mr. WALPOLE.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 2.]

LEAVE. FIRST READING.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH, in moving for leave to bring in a Bill to amend the Law relating to Prisons in Ireland, said, he should not detain the House by arguing in support of the principle of the measure, but would point out the differences between the proposals he was about to make and those contained in the Bill of his right hon. Friend (Mr. Assheton Cross). Much of the scheme was not new, for an Irish Prison Bill had been brought under the notice of the House by more than one of his Predecessors in office, although they did not go so far in the direction of reform as was now proposed. The idea of the large reform now contemplated originated with the late Lord

Mayo, who interested himself greatly in the management of prisons in Ireland, as well as in India. The number of county and borough prisons in Ireland, properly so called, was not so excessive as was the case in England. His right hon. Friend had on previous occasions informed the House of the great number of county and borough prisons in England, and he should follow his example by quoting some figures with respect to Ireland. In Ireland there were in 32 counties 38 county and borough prisons; being one in each county, except Tipperary, in which there were two; two in the city of Dublin, one in Drogheda city, while Cork and Limerick had each a separate city prison. In those 38 prisons he found that there was in 1875 a daily average number of prisoners in custody amounting to 2,741, the net cost of the gaols for the year being £94,658. He thought it would be admitted, even looking at the matter solely as it concerned county and city prisons, that there was great room for the adoption of a more economical and efficient system. They had in Ireland nearly the same difference as in England in the annual cost of maintenance of prisoners in the large and small gaols. He found that in Antrim Gaol, which included Belfast, the annual average cost of each prisoner was £17. In the county of Carlow, with an annual daily average of only 15 prisoners, the average annual cost of each prisoner was £91; in the county of Leitrim, with an average of 20 prisoners, the annual cost was £70; and in the county of the town of Drogheda, with a daily average of 15 prisoners, the annual cost was £34; and in Sligo, with a daily average of 22, the annual cost was £82. In Carlow, to 15 prisoners there were 13 officers, and in Leitrim with 20 prisoners there were 14 officers, and in Sligo 23 prisoners to 14 officers; he could, if necessary, quote further figures, which showed that there was the same room for economy in this matter as in England. In regard to industrial labour, Carlow gaol returned the profit of prison labour as nil; £6 was returned for Leitrim gaol during the last year. Passing from county and city prisons to others which were known only in Ireland, which were called bridewells, in these the necessity of reform was even more imperative than in the former class of gaols. Bridewells did did not exist in every county. There were as many as five counties in which there was not one. These prisons consisted of three classes—the district, the certified, and the ordinary bridewell; and they were used mainly as places where persons were locked up for a time on remand, but also to a small extent as places for the detention of convicted prisoners. In ordinary bridewells sentenced prisoners might be detained for short periods, not exceeding 48 hours. He could conceive nothing worse than the practice of imprisoning men in these little prisons for such short terms; he doubted the use of any sentence for less than seven days, and he could imagine no reason why men sentenced to imprisonment for seven days and upwards should not be sent to the larger prisons, which were, by means of the railways, brought within a fair distance of every part of Ireland. There might be one or two places in which these smaller prisons might be required, but, as a rule, they were entirely unnecessary, and to detain sentenced prisoners in such places would prevent their punishment from exercising a proper moral and deterrent effect. In many of these bridewells, owing to a defect in the law as to the appointment of a matron, there was no female official whatever. The female prisoners were, therefore, left to the care of male officers—who, of course, were frequently unmarried—and the abuses which occurred in consequence would easily be imagined. Many of these shorter sentences of 48 hours' imprisonment were imposed for drunkenness, and, in his opinion, they did more harm than good. Anybody who had studied the judicial statistics of Ireland would have noticed with regret the terrible increase of the offence of drunkenness in that country. He was bound to say that, in his opinion, this was not a little owing to the mistaken leniency of the magistrates who frequently imposed infinitesimal fines, and absurdly short and unsatisfactory terms of imprisonment for this offence. But bridewells were mainly used as places of remand, and some local provision for this purpose would still be required. No doubt, in many cases of serious crime, remands, even for lengthened periods, were absolutely necessary. In such case, however, for safe custody as well as for other reasons it was much better that prisoners under remand should be committed to the ordinary prisons. In other cases of short remand, a simple committal to the police cells, as in England, would suffice. Many of the constabulary barracks were already provided with suitable cells, and some of the bridewells might be handed over to the constabulary and utilized for this purpose. He proposed by a clause in the Bill to secure that any county in which "lock-up" accommodation of this kind was deficient should provide such accommodation at its own expense. This provision was based on a similar principle to that in the English Bill, that counties and boroughs in which sufficient accommodation for their prisoners was not provided should pay so much per cell for their prisoners. The main point of difference between this and the English Bill was one in regard to which he might suggest, that the Irish measure would be more complete, simple, and satisfactory than the English Bill: though from the larger population and greater number of gaols and prisoners in England a similar arrangement would probably not be practicable there. In Ireland at present the convict prisons were managed by what was legally a Board, but all the power was really vested in a single Director. A former Act gave the power to appoint as many as three Directors of Convict Prisons; but some years ago the Government, looking to the number of convicts and the work to be done, reduced the number of Directors from three to one. Circumstances, however, might arise, such as, for instance, the transfer of the convicts at present located at Spike Island to places better adapted for them, which would impose far greater labour and responsibility upon one Director than a single individual could properly and adequately perform. For many reasons, indeed, the management of the prisons ought not to be entirely left to one individual, and he should propose to vest the convict prisons and the ordinary prisons in a single Board, subject to the control of the Lord Lieutenant, who would be represented in the House of Commons by his Chief Secretary. Besides the three Directors of Convict Prisons and the two Inspectors-General of County Prisons there were two other offices legally existing in Ireland—the Inspectorship of Industrial and Reformatory Schools, and the Registrarship of Habitual Criminals;

Sir Michael Hicks-Beach

but the duties of the first office were now performed by one of the Inspectors-General of County Prisons, and those of the second by the Director of Convict Prisons. The powers exercised by these officers would also be vested in the Prisons Board, and thus the whole prison system of the country, including the Industrial and Reformatory Schools, would be vested in one Board. He believed that the economy, uniformity, and simplicity which would be secured by the Bill would commend the measure to the approval of Parliament. In addition to the differences which he had stated, there were some minor alterations which would be proposed in the Irish Prison Law, mainly in the direction of assimilating it with that of England. He would add that the Bill of last year contained no limitation of the power given to the Lord Lieutenant to close all prisons in a county. He now proposed to place some check on that power by requiring that in cases where the Lord Lieutenant might issue an Order to close the only prison in any county, the Order should be laid before Parliament within a certain period. He had now gone through the principal features of the measure, and he had only to thank the House for the attention which it had given to his explanation, and to move for leave to bring in the Bill.

MR. O'REILLY was of opinion that it was indispensable to secure the Industrial Schools from being brought under the management of the Prisons Board. Schools of such a nature ought not to be associated with the management of a Prisons Board, and any connection with the prisons would necessarily attach a certain amount of discredit to them.

Motion agreed to.

Bill to amend the Law relating to Prisons in Ireland, ordered to be brought in by Sir MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH and Mr. SOLICITOR GENERAL for IRELAND.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 3.]

LEAVE. FIRST READING.

THE LORD ADVOCATE, in rising to move for leave to bring in a Bill for amending the Law relating to Prisons in Scotland, said: The principles of the Bill are the same as those on which the measures relative to England and Ireland have been framed, and therefore I need not occupy the time of the House on that subject. We have been reducing the number of our prisons in Scotland very greatly of late years. Thirty years since we had 200 of those institutions, and they have been reduced to 56, of which 55 are managed by Local Boards. There are still a great deal too many of these local prisons. Some at times are nearly empty; others contain a population of not more than from five to ten at a time; and I believe the result of this measure would be to reduce the number very considerably, and to promote very largely economy and efficiency in the maintenance of those establishments. Since 1860, the date of our General Act, the local prisons of Scotland have been exclusively managed under rules framed by the Secretary of State, and the system so arranged has given great satisfaction. That system will be virtually continued. The Act of 1860 has been amended no fewer than three times by Acts of Parliament, and I may explain, in conclusion, that in framing this Bill we have endeavoured to bring the whole legislation in regard to prisons in Scotland within the compass of one statute.

Motion agreed to.

Bill to amend the Law relating to Prisons in Scotland, ordered to be brought in by The LORD ADVOCATE and Mr. Secretary Cross.

LEAVE. FIRST READING.

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON, in rising to move for leave to bring in a Bill to amend the Law with respect to the Appointment, Payment, and Fees of Clerks of Justices of the Peace and Clerks of Special and Petty Sessions, said, that as far back as 1851 the question and the payment of these clerks by fees instead of salaries was raised, and a clause was passed enabling localities to adopt that mode of payment. The change was obviously desirable in many cases in which the fees were far in excess of the penalty inflicted, or intended to be inflicted, by the magistrates, and where this was the case people got an idea that the magistrates were urged to convict by the clerks for the sake of their own profit. More recently, and particularly in 1872, attempts were made to render compulsory the payment of clerks by salary, and almost all the resistance they met with was due to differences of opinion about uniformity of fees, which, however desirable, was practically impossible. The salaries of the clerks to the Justices were often in excess of the fees received in their districts, and the Bill was framed to meet the inevitable differences between rural and populous districts, and would call upon some localities to submit fresh tables of fees to the Home Secretary.

Motion agreed to.

Bill to amend the Law with respect to the Appointment, Payment, and Fees of Clerks of Justices of the Peace and Clerks of Special and Petty Sessions, ordered to be brought in by Sir HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON and Mr. Secretary Cross.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

Resolved, That whenever notice has been given that Estimates will be moved in Committee of Supply and the Committee [stands as the first Order of the Day upon any day except Thursday and Friday, on which Government Orders have precedence, the Speaker shall, when the Order for the Committee has been read, forthwith leave the Chair without putting any Question, and the House shall thereupon resolve itself into such Committee, unless on going into Committee on the Army, Navy, or Civil Service Estimates respectively, an Amendment be moved relating to the division of Estimates proposed to be considered on that day.—(Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer.)

COMMITTEE ON PRINTING.

MR. W. H. SMITH moved that the Select Committee to assist Mr. Speaker in all matters which relate to the Printing executed by Order of this House, and for the purpose of selecting and arranging for Printing, Returns and Papers presented in pursuance of Motions made by Members of this House, do consist of—Mr. Spencer Walpole, Mr. Henley, The O'Connor Don, Mr. Hunt, Mr. Stansfeld, Mr. Sclater-Booth, Mr. Dodson, Mr. Massey, Mr. Whitbread, and Mr. William Henry Smith.

MR. BUTT complained of the constitution of the Committee, and regretted that the practice of excluding Irish Members from the composition of Committees of the House was to be continued. He contended that it was desirable that every Committee should represent each section of the House. He was by no means satisfied with the composition of this Committee, and he hoped the hon. Gentleman would postpone his Motion for a day or two, for he should like to have a short conversation with him in private, in order that a satisfactory arrangement might be come to on this point.

MR. W. H. SMITH said, he had no objection to postpone the nomination of the Committee if it was the desire of the hon. and learned Member, but he would remind him that the names of the hon. Members whom he proposed were names that had been on the Committee for more than one Parliament, and their duties were almost nominal.

Motion postponed.

LEAVE. FIRST READING.

MR. HOPWOOD, in moving for leave to bring in a Bill to amend the Law relating to Summary Procedure before Justices; to extend the right of Appeal in certain cases; and for other purposes, said, the Bill proposed to deal with a great number of unnecessary committals to prison which were forced on magistrates by the present law. About one-third of the 90,000 persons now imprisoned were committed, not because they had committed crime, but because they were unable to pay fines. If the magistrates could grant them indulgence and allow them to pay fines by instalments, that would in many cases prevent the inflicting imprisonment. The Bill would also provide that in all cases of committal to gaol there should be an appeal to a superior Court, and abolish the right of the magistrate to commit for longer periods than six months on a cumulative series of convictions. It would also afford some relief to persons who were kept in prison for want of bail and sureties.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS said, that he would not oppose the introduction of the Bill, but he had stated last year that it was the intention of the Government to introduce a Bill dealing with this subject. The question was also mentioned in the Queen's Speech, but to that circumstance the hon. and learned Member had not adverted. He (Mr. Cross) hoped that at any rate the hon. and learned Member would not proceed with the second reading of the Bill until after the introduction of the Government measure.

OBSERVATIONS.

THE DUKE OF ST. ALBANS asked Her Majesty's Government, Whether it was correctly stated in the newspapers that Officers of the Royal Engineers were sent out to Constantinople last autumn; in what capacity they surveyed the defences there; and in what light their mission was represented to the Turkish Government? His attention had been directed to statements which had appeared in the newspapers to the effect that Engineer Officers had been sent out to Constantinople and were now engaged in surveying the defences in and around that city. Should the noble Earl the Under Secretary for War be able to deny these statements he should not regret having trespassed on their Lordships' indulgence. Should, however, he admit that, at a critical time of the war between Turkey and Servia, officers of the Royal Engineers were sent out to advise on the defence of Constantinople, he thought Parliament had a right to ask from Her Majesty's Government an explanation of so unusual a course. He trusted his noble Friend would tell them under what understanding facilities had been obtained from the Turkish authorities for those officers to perform their duties. He wanted to know how it was that, while British diplomacy was telling the Porte "You have nothing to expect from us," British officers were considering how the capital of Turkey could be preserved from a possible calamity—that while the Government and the Press of this country were impressing on the Turkish Government the necessity of concession and the hopelessness of resistance our scientific officers were said to have reported that the line of the Balkan was unforceable and Constantinople invulnerable by land. True, it was not a great military demonstration; but he believed the presence of those three or four English officers had influenced the Council and public opinion of Stamboul more than the thousands of Russians massed on the frontier. Could the Porte seriously believe that a Government which sent those officers meant to do nothing? Was it surprising that the action of the War Office had more weight with them than the words of the Ambassador? If Her Majesty's Government were at the time prepared to have gone to war for Turkey, every one must admit that they were wise to be prepared and in the course they took. But if their policy at that time was the same as that stated by the Chancellor of the Exchequer now, he asked, What was the use of seeking for this information? These English officers were there under false pretences. He asked his noble Friend this Question from no unpatriotic motive, and should feel glad if his asking it enabled the noble Earl to give a satisfactory explanation of an announcement which at the time created apprehension at home and irritation abroad. He believed Colonel Bent, Royal Engineers, and two Engineers were sent on a like mission just before the Crimean War, and this made the proceeding respecting which he now sought information of still greater importance than it would otherwise have been.

EARL CADOGAN: My Lords, officers have from time to time been employed by the War Office in various parts of the East to obtain intelligence that was thought necessary for the service of Her Majesty's Government. It is obviously impossible for me to enter in this House upon the details of the information which they may from time to time have acquired. I can, however, assure the noble Duke that these officers have been employed exclusively in the service and for the objects of Her Majesty's Government, and that their services would never have been placed at the disposal of any foreign Government whatsoever; nor has any expectation ever been held out that their services would be so placed. With regard to the last part of the Question of the noble Duke, I have to say that no instructions were given to Her Majesty's Ambassador to make any representations to the Turkish Government on the subject.

METROPOLIS—HYDE PARK CORNER.

QUESTION. OBSERVATIONS.

EARL FORTESCUE asked Her Majesty's Government, Whether they are prepared to take early steps, by opening a new communication between Piccadilly and Grosvenor Place, to divert the traffic coming from the north and east into Belgravia, which has during certain hours of the day during several seasons caused such a highly inconvenient block of vehicles at Hyde Park Corner; and whether, to afford some slight relief meanwhile, they will cause the roadway at Hyde Park Corner to be widened forthwith seven or eight feet by throwing the footpath there further back and carrying it through the two little gardens to the north of each side of the Arch at the top of Constitution Hill? The noble Earl said that the crush, to which his Question referred had been long increasing year after year. It had been for the last two years such as would be discreditable to any civilized metropolis, and in his opinion was all the more discreditable to London because this was the richest capital in the world. Year after year there had been various projects for the relief of the block; but as yet nothing had been done. In these matters we moved very slowly. In 1845 he was a Member of a Committee of the House of Commons on Metropolitan Communications which took evidence, and carefully considered the various recommendations embodied in its Report, and among others one which he had the honour of making to it—namely, that of the opening of Hamilton Place, which was carried into effect just a quarter of a century afterwards. The relief afforded by this was very great; but since it was adopted the wealth of London and the number of conveyances having to pass by Hyde Park Corner had enormously increased, and every year the block caused by the traffic there was becoming greater and greater. Even the slight measure which he now suggested, though totally inadequate to the requirements of the case, would give appreciable relief by affording width for one additional line of carriages; and it had the advantage, that there would be no difficulty and little expense in adopting it.

THE EARL OF BEACONSFIELD: My Lords, the subject which the noble Earl has brought before us is one which interests everybody. I assure him that it has not been neglected by Her Majesty's Government; but he who is so well acquainted with the subject will readily understand that there are great difficulties connected with it. Several plans have been under the consideration of the Board of Works, and one of them has been favourably considered; but the difficulties which have to be encountered successfully before that plan can be carried into effect are considerable, and I am sorry to say that not the least considerable would arise from the Chancellor of the Exchequer, for the plan would be expensive, though I believe it would be effective and satisfactory. I hope the noble Earl will be satisfied with the answer I give him as to the first part of his Question—that the subject is engaging the sedulous attention of the First Commissioner of Works. With respect to the second part of the Question—whether the Government will adopt the suggestion of the noble Earl—the answer that I have to make is that the scheme has been considered by the Board of Works. According to the report made to me, in their opinion the remedial effect would be infinitesimally small, while the expense would not be trifling. Moreover, we must recollect that it is an expense that would be entirely thrown away, and would therefore be a useless addition to the expenditure that must be encountered in the carrying out of an effective plan.

THE EARL OF POWIS said, he believed a great improvement might be made at a moderate cost, and one which would give a substantial relief at Hyde Park Corner, by very nearly following the lines of the plan exhibited last year. The proposal of last year for constructing a subway failed, because it unduly raised the level of the roadway where it ran under Constitution Hill, and the reason for desiring a bridge of the height which would do that was to enable carriages, waggons, &c., to pass under. His suggestion was that a gravel slope might be made from the end of Hamilton Place to the Green Park, passing by a subway under Constitution Hill. He would make the subway so that it would only raise the road on Constitution Hill imperceptibly—a foot at most. This would give sufficient headway to persons riding on horseback, broughams, cabs, and ordinary carriages. He believed that taking away this light traffic and a large quantity of the foot traffic as well would be a very sensible relief to the road opposite St. George's Hospital. It was obvious that all traffic going from Victoria Station to the north-western district and Paddington would pass along this suggested route; and he believed the subway might be made at a moderate cost.

THE EARL OF REDESDALE said, he had himself submitted a plan to the Board of Works some time ago, and he supposed that plan still remained there. The suggestion which he had made was, that the Wellington Arch should be left for the Queen as an entrance to her private gardens, and that with it a small portion of the upper corner of the Park should be added to them. That there should be a road from Hamilton Place to Halkin Street, over which the Queen's private road should pass on a bridge on the level of the roadway at the Arch. The soil from the cutting would supply the necessary embankment which, being within the garden, might be planted with shrubs and trees, and would not be unsightly. Another road to be carried from Hamilton Place to Constitution Hill, to be used by carriages like other roads in St. James's Park, affording a direct communication from Piccadilly to Parliament and Lower Westminster without entering Grosvenor Place. He believed that this plan would afford greater public accommodation than any other hitherto proposed.

LORD DUNSANY said, that the heavy traffic in the neighbourhood of Hyde Park was greatly on the increase, and it would be well to consider whether a subway might not be made from Grosvenor Place to some distance the other side of Hyde Park. It would be impossible to make a subway of similar length in any other part of the metropolis for so moderate a sum, because there would be no purchase of property until the subway was carried to the lower end of Grosvenor Place.

EARL FORTESCUE protested against the notion that what he had suggested need cost more than very little. The same pavement, railings, and lamp-posts would be available for use again after widening the roadway. But, from what he had heard of the unreasonable expen-siveness of much of the work done by the Board of Works, he thought it very likely they would contrive to make even this very costly.

House adjourned at half past Five o'clock, till To-morrow, half past Ten o'clock.

POST OFFICE TELEGRAPH DEPARTMENT.—QUESTIONS.

MR. GOLDSMID asked the Postmaster General, What steps have been taken with regard to the recommendations of the Committee which sat last Session to consider the management of the Telegraphs?

LORD JOHN MANNERS, in reply, said, that in August a scheme for the re-organization of the Telegraph Department, based upon the Report of the Select Committee, was submitted by him to the Treasury, and it was still under the consideration of the Government. With respect to the Press, he had thought it inexpedient to do more than simply adopt the suggestion made by the Committee, that each message requiring a separate transmission and delivery should be separately charged for at the rate of 1s. for one address, with a charge of 2d. for every additional address. Systematic inquiries had been and were still being made into the exact telegraphic requirements of each post-office, and in all possible cases steps had been taken, as suggested by the Committee, to diminish the force employed. The Committee had further suggested that a profit and loss account, of a commercial character, should be prepared in order to be laid before Parliament, and he had submitted an account of that nature to the Treasury for the purpose of being submitted to both Houses of Parliament.

MR. W. E. FORSTER asked whether the noble Lord would lay on the Table the new regulations with regard to the Press?

LORD JOHN MANNERS: Certainly.

MR. GOLDSMID: Will the accounts submitted to the Treasury be laid before the House?

LORD JOHN MANNERS: That is rather a question for the Treasury when it has decided upon the subject.

TURKEY—THE ATROCITIES IN BULGARIA.—QUESTIONS.

MR. EVELYN ASHLEY asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, with reference to Lord Derby's Despatch of the 21st September last, about the outrages recently committed on the Christian population of Bulgaria, in which Despatch Her Majesty's Ambassador at Constantinople is instructed, after demanding an audience of the Sultan, to "call for reparation and justice in the name of the Queen and of Her Majesty's Government," and to urge that the "rebuilding of the houses and churches should be begun at once," and "necessary assistance given for the restoration" of the native industries, and above all to "point out that it is a matter of absolute necessity that the 80 women should be found and restored to their families;" and in which Despatch His Excellency is further instructed at the same audience "to mention by name Shefket Pasha, Hafiz Pasha, Tossoun Bey, Achmet Aga, and the other officials" whose conduct had been denounced in Mr. Baring's Report, and to urge "that striking examples should be made on the spot of those who have connived at or taken part in the atrocities," and that "the persons who have been decorated or promoted under a false impression of their conduct should be tried and degraded where this has not been done already." What steps have been taken by the Turkish Government to comply with the demands of Her Majesty's Government?

MR. BOURKE: The hon. and learned Member asks me, what steps have been taken to comply with the demands made by Her Majesty's Government in the despatch of Lord Derby, which is contained in the Papers issued, of the 21st September last? Now, Sir, as nearly all the Papers are in the Blue Books which are before the House, I am afraid it would be rather difficult for me to give a satisfactory answer to my hon. and learned Friend without going into considerable length, and I do not suppose that the House would desire me to quote a great number of despatches which relate to the subject. They are all before the House, so far as they relate to matters which have occurred down to the date of the despatches in the Blue Books. At the same time I dare say it might be satisfactory to the House if I make a short statement which will show exactly what has been done since the date of the despatch which my hon. and learned Friend has alluded to. In the first place, I dare say hon. and learned Members who have read the Blue Book will see that a despatch was addressed by Lord Derby to Lord Salisbury on the 24th November last—at the time when at Constantinople—and there are two or three paragraphs in that despatch which, with the permission of the House, I will read. They will be found about the middle of that despatch.—

"It is with regret that Her Majesty's Government have learnt from the subsequent reports of Mr. Baring and Her Majesty's Consular officers, how little has been done to give effect to these assurances of the Sultan."

That refers to the assurances given by the Sultan at the time the despatch of the 21st of September was read to him by Sir Henry Elliot.

"Shefket Pacha has been retained in posts of honour, and although Achmet Aga has been at last arrested, his son, who is accused of being equally culpable, has been allowed to escape, and is in concealment among the Mussulmans. The Turkish authorities have only sent a sum of £7,000 for the rebuilding and repair of the villages, although the Turks themselves have estimated the amount required at £30,000; and at one place, Ali Bey, a notorious fanatic and a participator in the outrages, has been appointed to superintend the works. Nothing whatever appears to have been done to restore the industries of the Christian population. From the reports which have reached Her Majesty's Government it is doubtful how many of the 80 women have been restored to their homes. Sixty-eight women and children are stated to have been brought back to Batak, but others still remain in the hands of their captors or are otherwise retained, and the efforts of the Pacha of Salonica to recover those who had been taken to that Province have been impeded by the Mutessarif of Drama and other subordinates. Instead of examples having been made on the spot, the inquiries of the Commission under Sadoullah Bey have been conducted at a distance from the scene of the principal outrages, and witnesses have had consequently to be summoned from a considerable distance, the proceedings being thus delayed, the effect of examples lost, and the ends of justice to a great extent frustrated. The conduct of the Commission has also been in many other respects most unsatisfactory. The few members of it who have shown any capacity for judicial investigation have been checked and hindered by the interruptions of their colleagues, and months after the massacre of hundreds of women and children and of unarmed men, the Commissioners are still considering whether such murders are crimes."—[Turkey, No. 2, 1877—p. 15.]

I think I have read sufficient of that despatch. I will read more if the House wishes; but I think that what I have read shows what was the opinion of Her Majesty's Government on the 24th November with regard to the progress made on the subject referred to by my hon. and learned Friend. Lord Salisbury executed the instructions he received under that despatch on the 8th December. I need not read what Lord Salisbury says in his despatch, which will be found in the Blue Book; but I may state generally the results of the Commission sitting at Philippopolis for the trial of the persons implicated in the events in Bulgaria. Achmet Aga and Melto Behtash have been condemned to death; Achmet Tchaousch of Kara Boulak to hard labour for life; Alish Pelwan to four years' hard labour; Fetha to eight years' hard labour; Abdullah Effendi, the Kaitik of the Mudir of Derbend, to three and a half years' hard labour; Kutchuk Halil to six months' imprisonment; and Achmet Tchaousch of Dorkovo to three months' imprisonment. The Vali of Adrianople has also been dismissed, and Ali Bey, Mutessarif of Drama, has been recalled. Hafiz Effendi has been acquitted, it having been proved that he was not present at the massacres. Tossoun Bey, who, according to Mr. Baring's Reports, was one of the most deserving of punishment, has been acquitted, and Mr. Baring has in consequence been recalled by Mr. Jocelyn from attending the Commission at Philippopolis. When the Commissioners have finished the cases of Batak and Dervent, they are to proceed to Tirnova to make inquiries north of the Balkans. With respect to Shefket Pasha, a Commission has been despatched to the caza of Slimnia, to inquire into what occurred there last May; and when that Commission has finished its labours, if it appears that he ought to be put upon his trial the authorities have already promised that nothing shall be done to shield him from the consequences of his acts. With regard to that part of the Question relating to the re-building of the houses and churches, some progress, I am glad to say, has been made. Mr. Baring reports that none of the villagers are without some sort of shelter. Mr. Long—whose efforts we all know for bettering the condition of the Bulgarians—has also been endeavouring to give them what assistance he can. He states that the Turkish authorities are friendly, and he has every reason to be grateful for the support they have uniformly given him. Little apparently has hitherto been done to assist the restoration of the native industries, and with regard to the 80 women missing from Batak, 68 women and children are stated to have been sent back. Relief has also been distributed by the authorities generally, and agricultural implements have been supplied to some of the destitute villagers. I hope the House will be satisfied with this very meagre summary of some of the despatches which will be found in the Blue Book. I do not think I could have trespassed much further on the attention of the House. The whole subject is contained in the Blue Books, and if the hon. and learned Gentleman wishes for any more Papers regarding any particular case I shall be happy to lay them before the House. Under any circumstances Her Majesty's Government will continue to present to the House from time to time any information that may be received.

1876, "That Her Majesty's Government were not insensible to the gravity of the responsibility that rested upon them" with respect to the 1854 Loan, Her Majesty's Government have taken any steps in the matter; and, if so, what state the negotiations are in at present?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Her Majesty's Government have not paid the coupon due this month on the Turkish Guaranteed Loan of 1855, the Turkish Government having provided the full amount required. With regard to the loan of 1854, Her Majesty's Government have taken steps to fulfil the pledge which they gave to the House of Commons. On agreement between the Treasury and the Foreign Office, Lord Derby instructed Lord Lyons to ascertain whether the French Government would join in a representation to the Porte on behalf of the bondholders of 1854, adding a suggestion that the two Governments might, in the interests of all concerned, proffer their good offices to facilitate the conclusion of an agreement. The Duc Decazes replied expressing the readiness of the French Government to instruct the French Ambassador at Constantinople to come to an understanding with his English Colleague and to secure their joint action in regard to the Loans of 1854 and 1855. Accordingly, instructions have been sent to Her Majesty's Chargé d'Affaires at Constantinople to give effect, on behalf of England, to the joint resolution of the two Governments.

CARLISLE PLACE ORPHANAGE.

QUESTION.

MR. WHALLEY asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, with reference to the infant mortality of 98 per cent. at the Roman Catholic Orphanage at Carlisle Place, Westminster, as officially reported, Whether it is his intention to cause inquiry as to like institutions where children are taken under Roman Catholic care, at the public cost or otherwise, but not now subject to public inspection or control?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS: Sir, when this matter was first brought under my consideration some two months ago, I asked the Local Government Board to allow one of its Inspectors to make inquiries into the state of the orphanage. That Inspector was met by the ladies who had charge of the institution, who showed him over the place, and offered to avail themselves of any suggestions he might make for the better protection of infant life. The Inspector made several recommendations with the view of carrying out that object. I thought it right a few weeks ago to ask the Inspector to go again, in order to see whether his recommendations were carried out. I have not yet received his Report, and I do not know what it may be. But it is right I should state, on behalf of those ladies who undertook the management of this purely charitable institution, that I have this morning received a Report from the sanitary authority of the Westminster Board of Works, who had sent their own medical officer to make a report for their own satisfaction. The conclusion of that Report is as follows:—

"I cannot speak too highly of the general cleanliness of this institution, and of the devotedness of those ladies who have undertaken to conduct it."

As to that part of the Question of the hon. Member which asks me whether it is my intention to cause inquiry as to like institutions where children are taken under Roman Catholic care, at the public cost or otherwise, I have to say that I thought it right in consequence of what was brought under my notice, to ask for particulars not of institutions of this kind conducted by Roman Catholics alone, but of institutions conducted by persons of all creeds and classes, as far as possible. I may say that of these poor children who are taken into this institution out of purely charitable motives, one-half would have died if they had not been admitted. They are generally taken into such institutions in a state of the most miserable destitution, and are deprived of the proper nourishment they should receive. It is a question whether such institutions may not require to be put under certain regulations, for medical men are of opinion that the bringing together of too many infants in one place is likely to increase their mortality. But that is a question to be afterwards considered. The matter is under the consideration of the Local Government Board as well as of myself, but without regard to any question of creeds or religions.

QUESTION.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL had a Question on the Paper asking, Whether Sir Henry Elliott, after being ordered to leave Constantinople as a mark of the high dissatisfaction of Her Majesty's Government at the conduct of the Turkish Government, had received addresses from certain deputations, &c. The hon. Member explained that in adopting these words he had assumed as a fact what on referring to the Blue Book he found was not established, and he accordingly wished to put his Question to the Chancellor of the Exchequer in this form, Whether in fact Her Majesty's Government did, like the other Powers, mark the high dissatisfaction of Her Majesty with the Porte by the withdrawal and non-replacement of Her Ambassador; whether Sir Henry Elliot was still in the service of Her Majesty; if so, whether there was any truth in the statements made in the public prints that he had received addresses from certain deputations and made replies of the character attributed to him; and particularly whether it was true that after Lord Salisbury had left Constantinople with a solemn warning that the conduct of the Porte involved "dangers near at hand which would threaten the very existence of Turkey," Sir Henry, on the contrary, expressed great confidence in the future of Turkey; and that he further expressed an expectation of seeing those who addressed him again in a few months, thereby conveying the impression that his absence was to be quite temporary.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: It is very difficult to answer Questions of this kind, which really involve a good deal of controversial matter. I trust the House and the hon. Member will allow me, in answer, to confine myself to a statement of facts, without entering in any way into any argument such as this Question seems to point to. Sir Henry Elliot is still in the service of Her Majesty, and the circumstances under which he left Constantinople are to be found recorded in the Blue Book. I may mention, though it is a little beside the Question, that Sir Henry Elliot some short time ago requested permission to go on sick leave, his health being affected by the strain of his duties, but that he was requested to remain in consequence of the pressure of business, and especially with regard to the Conference. He was, therefore, still at his post when, on the 22nd December, Lord Derby addressed to Lord Salisbury a telegraphic despatch which will be found in the Blue Book. In that despatch these words were used—

"In the event of the Porte persisting in its refusal, and the Conference failing, your Excellency (that is Lord Salisbury) will, of course, come away, and it will be desirable in that case that Sir Henry Elliot should also come to England to report upon the situation, leaving a Secretary in charge of the Embassy."

Nothing was said in those instructions as to dissatisfaction or non-replacement of the Ambassador or anything of that kind. The Conference, as is known, did fail, and Sir Henry Elliot, accordingly, did place the Embassy in charge of a Chargé d'Affaires and came to England. With regard to any deputation he may have received, we have had information that certain deputations did wait on him. But I am not sure whether a record has been kept of his replies. Certainly nothing which has reached the Foreign Office on this subject requires, in the opinion of my noble Friend (the Earl of Derby), that any notice should be taken by him of anything that has been said by Sir Henry Elliot.

IRELAND—THE CONSTABULARY—CASE OF SUPERINTENDENT HILL.

QUESTION.

MR. CLIVE asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland, Whether he will produce the Correspondence relating to the dismissal of Mr. Hill, late Superintendent of Constabulary in county Mayo, including the Memorial of the Grand Jury of the said county?

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH, in reply, said, that if the hon. Member would be good enough to specify the correspondence he referred to, he would see whether it could be produced. He thought it right to add that Mr. Hill had not been dismissed, but had retired on a pension.

OYSTER FISHERIES.—QUESTION.

SIR CHARLES LEGARD asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, If he proposes to bring in a Bill this Session dealing with the Oyster Fisheries of England and Scotland?

SIR CHARLES ADDERLEY: In accordance with the recommendation of the Select Committee on Oysters, we had an inspection of the oyster fisheries established under orders of the Board of Trade, and the result was laid before Parliament on the first day of the Session, and will shortly be in the hands of Members. It is intended to bring in a Bill on the subject in the course of the Session; but pending the Report of the Inspectors of Crab and Lobster Fisheries, I cannot say whether the Bill will include both subjects.

SCOTLAND—PROCEDURE IN THE COURT OF TEINDS.—QUESTION.

MR. MACKINTOSH asked the Lord Advocate, Whether it is his intention to introduce a Bill to amend and simplify procedure in the Court of Teinds, Scotland, and to provide for the commutation of Teinds?

THE LORD ADVOCATE: The Question put by the hon. Member for the Inverness Burghs involves two questions, one relating to procedure in teind cases, and the other, I rather think, intended to comprehend the general question as to the law of teinds. My attention of late has been very specially directed to that law, but it is one which involves numerous and complicated interests, and doubting as I do whether a mere Procedure Bill would remove all causes of complaint, I cannot undertake that a Bill dealing with both these questions will be introduced this Session.

THE WAR OFFICE—SANITARY CONDITION.—QUESTION.

SIR WILLIAM FRASER asked the First Commissioner of Works, Whether his attention has been called to the circumstances of the deaths of Lieutenant General Sir James Lindsay, of General Egerton, of Colonels Middleton and Jennings, and to the mortality and sickness among the officers and civilians employed at the War Office and Horse Guards in Pall Mall; whether complaints have been made at various times relating to the supposed pestilential condition of these buildings; if so, whether he will lay Copies of those complaints upon the Table of the House; and, whether he will lay upon the Table of the House the Report of the Royal Commission lately appointed by Her Majesty?

MR. GERARD NOEL, in reply, said, the attention of the Government had been called to the deaths of the officers referred to by name, and he was glad to be able to state that they were not in any way to be attributed to the unhealthy condition of the War Office. From a War Office Return issued on the 19th of January last, it appeared that out of the total number of employés—namely, 630—there were nine absent owing to sickness. One of the illnesses was typhoid fever, and the others were bronchitis, congestion of the liver, stoppage of the bowels, rheumatic gout, sprain, and a disease of the mouth. During the year 1876 there was only one case of typhoid fever. Complaints had been made with regard to the condition of the building, but these formed part of the Departmental Minutes and could not be laid on the Table of the House; but these complaints had been attended to by the Board of Works, who had in every case endeavoured to remedy the evil. A Committee—not a Royal Commission—consisting of Sir William Jenner and others was appointed to inquire into the sanitary condition of the War Office, and their Report was ready and would forthwith be printed. He could assure the House that every exertion would be made on the part of the War Office and the Office of Works to carry out stringently and effectually the recommendations of the Committee.

TURKEY—THE PAPERS ON THE AFFAIRS OF TURKEY.—QUESTION.

MR. W. E. FORSTER: I wish to put to the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs a Question, of which I have given him private Notice, relating to the Blue Books on the Eastern Question. In the second of the Blue Books, under date January the 2nd of this year, Lord Derby wrote a despatch to Lord Lyons, in which it is stated—

“ I told the French Ambassador so long ago as last summer that I had warned Musurus Pasha that the Porte must not expect material assistance from England in the event of a Russian War.”

I do not think any such despatch is to be found amongst the Papers of last year; and I wish to ask whether that document is amongst the despatches, and, if so, whether Her Majesty's Government have any objection to produce it? If there be such a despatch—and I imagine there is, for it was publicly stated by Lord Derby last Thursday that some such despatch had been written—I do not doubt that the Government will think it right to explain why it is not included in the despatches given last year, being of a very important nature, and being also, I may add, of a nature which must have somewhat surprised every unofficial Member of this House.

MR. BOURKE: In reply to the right hon. Gentleman, I may say that the despatch would naturally have been in the Blue Book presented last year, unless it appeared to the Secretary of State that at that time it was inexpedient to produce it. At present the circumstances were changed, and Her Majesty's Government would be happy to produce it when called for by the right hon. Gentleman. Whether it will be necessary for me to state any reason why it was not produced last year I am not sure; but I think hon. Members, on reading that despatch, will see that there was very good reason for not producing it last year.

MR. W. E. FORSTER: Will it be necessary that I should move for its production?

MR. BOURKE: I will lay it on the Table.

HOUSE OCCUPIERS DISQUALIFICATION REMOVAL BILL—[BILL 23.]

(Sir Henry Wolff, Sir Charles Russell, Sir Charles Legard, Mr. Onslow, Mr. Ryder.)

Order for Second Reading read.

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF, in moving that the Bill be now read a second time, said, its object was to remove certain electoral anomalies. It had already been before the House two Sessions, and had on several occasions been approved by large majorities.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Sir H. Drummond Wolff.)

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said, that the Bill had not been delivered, and therefore the House could not proceed with the discussion of it. He moved that the debate be adjourned.

MR. DILLWYN seconded the Motion.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Debate be now adjourned."—(Sir Charles W. Dilke.)

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF said, he thought the hon. Baronet must know it by heart by this time. It was by some gross negligence that it had not been delivered, for it had been given to be printed on Friday, and other Bills sent in that day had been delivered that morning. The fault had lain with the printer, but copies had been sent to the House in the course of the day, and were now lying on the Table. He thought the objection taken was merely a pretext, and, believing himself to be quite in Order, he would not withdraw the Motion.

MR. KNATCHBULL - HUGESSEN knew nothing of the Bill, and could not therefore discuss it. But he appealed to the Government not to support the inconvenient precedent of reading a Bill a second time before it had been printed and delivered to hon. Members. This Bill might be approved by hon. Gentlemen opposite and it might be an excellent Bill, but he would warn the Government that in future Parliaments there might be in a similar position some Bill which they and their friends greatly disapproved, and they might find the precedent quoted against them. It was an almost invariable rule of the House to insist that a Bill should be printed before it was allowed to be read a second time, and he hoped there would be no departure from this salutary rule.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER sympathized with his hon. Friend on the hard fortune he had experienced in connection with this Bill on former occasions, and which seemed to be still pursuing him. The Bill was short, and might have been printed and distributed in a few hours, and it was so well known that, had it been circulated, there could have been no objection to proceeding with the second reading at this early period of the Session. He was bound, however, to recognize the force of the objection taken by hon. Gentlemen opposite. They had to choose between a general convenience and a particular inconvenience, and they must bear in mind that hard cases made bad law. This seemed to him a hard case; but if they were on this occasion to infringe the unwritten rule which forbade the discussion of a Bill before its delivery, they would, he thought, be setting a very bad precedent, and he must therefore advise his hon. Friend to consent to a postponement of the Motion.

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF said, out of deference to the House, he had no alternative but to yield to the appeal; but he hoped the Government would give him a day.

SALE OF INTOXICATING LIQUORS ON SUNDAY (IRELAND) BILL.—[BILL 50.]

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. RICHARD SMYTH, in rising to move that the Bill be now read a second time, said: I am happy to think that it will be hardly necessary for me to address myself to the provisions of this Bill, as happily the principle of it may now be regarded as generally admitted. When the Bill was read a second time last year there was an appeal against it on the ground that as soon as the masses of the people of Ireland became aware that the House of Commons was thoroughly in earnest in its desire to pass a Sunday closing law, an agitation would be at once set on foot in that country in opposition to the measure. We were then told that this House would be flooded with Petitions, that loud protests from all sides would be heard, and that indignation meetings would be convened in all parts of Ireland. I did not myself think that there was much force in those appeals. But notwithstanding the opposition which my Friends gave to that proposition a delay took place, and what has been the result? Indignation meetings, if we may so call them, have undoubtedly been held; but, instead of these meetings being convened for the purpose of protesting against the Bill, they have, so far as I am aware, in every instance been convened for the purpose of passing resolutions expressive of deep regret that the Bill did not become law last year. In fact, I think I am within the limits of strict accuracy in saying that in Ireland there is no public opinion whatsoever against this measure—at least, no public opinion against it has been expressed. Then, on the other side, Petitions unprecedented in number, and in the number of signatures attached to them, have been already presented to this House, and I may state that to-night Petitions signed by 89,000 persons in various towns of Ireland have been presented in favour of the Bill. This is, of course, only a small instalment of the Petitions likely to be presented. Large and enthusiastic meetings have been held in the great centres of population in Ireland which have passed resolutions in its favour; and, so far as I am aware, no resolution at any public meeting in Ireland has been passed against it. A canvass of the 19 large towns which the Government last year proposed to exempt from the operation of the Bill has been instituted with the following results—I shall merely give the aggregate without entering into details:—96,934 householders have expressed their opinion in writing in favour of the Bill, and only 11,331 against. Of those same towns the licensed traders in liquors who have voted have expressed their opinion in the following proportion:—1,255 of these licensed traders have given their opinion in its favour, and only 1,037 against. Several elections have taken place in Ireland during the Parliamentary Recess, and in every instance an avowed supporter of this measure has been returned. The late Member for Sligo (Sir Robert Gore Booth) was a consistent opponent of this Bill. He has been succeeded by a friend of the measure. Of the five candidates who at first announced themselves for the representation of the county of Waterford, one gentleman proclaimed himself a strenuous opponent of the Sunday closing of public-houses. The electors of the county made short work of him, summarily dismissing him from the candidature, and he found no one to place his name on the nomination paper. In fact, in all the history of legislation in this House I believe no stronger case has ever been made for the passing of any measure, if we are to take public opinion as a test and guide of what ought to be done in the matter of legislation. I have only, Sir, to say that I have selected the earliest day at my disposal for very good reasons; at least, I think them very valid reasons. I was unfortunate in the ballot on Thursday last. I believe I was the last but one, my Bill coming out, I believe, No. 50 or 56, at all events very low down. I saw at once that it was quite impossible for me to obtain a day by deferring it to a distant part of the Session, and in consequence of a statement made by the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland, in reply to a Question from my hon. Friend the Member for Wexford county (Mr. O'Clery), I was led to take the first available day of the Session for this Bill. The Chief Secretary, with that perfect frankness which has always, so far as I can judge, characterised his management of Irish business, and of all matters that come under his control, has stated to the House that it was not the intention of himself or the Government to offer any opposition to the principle of this measure, reserving to himself the right of taking the best means at his disposal of placing before the House certain evidence, which, in his opinion, was of a weighty character, against the application of the Bill to some of the largest towns in Ireland. After that frank statement of the right hon. Gentleman I thought I was justified in availing myself of the earliest day at my disposal for proposing the second reading of the measure. Then, as regards some hon. Friends of mine from Ireland, who opposed the Bill last year, I may state that there were 11 of them then, and that number is now reduced to 10. We know the very vigorous, and, indeed, the very successful efforts which were made by these hon. Gentlemen last year in the hot days of July and August, in the way of talking against this Bill. I think each of these hon. Friends of mine will be obliged to me for commencing at this early stage of the Session, as it will certainly afford them greater scope and a cooler season of the year for the expression of their views, and for their patriotic exertions. I have nothing more to say, and will conclude by moving that the Bill be now read a second time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Richard Smyth.)

MR. O'SULLIVAN Sir, I will appeal to you to say whether it is just, right, or in accordance with the usages of this House, that a Bill of this kind, dealing with the property of 16,000 or 18,000 persons in my country, and restricting the liberties and ancient privileges of the people, should be forced on so precipitately on what is really the first night of the Session? The Bill cannot yet have got into the hands of the persons chiefly interested in this question.

MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Member asks me whether we are proceeding according to usage in discussing the second reading of this Bill. I am bound to say that the matter is properly before us.

MR. O'SULLIVAN: I rise to object to this Bill being read a second time. I do so, Sir, for many reasons. I rise to oppose it because it is contrary to the wishes of the large majority of the people of Ireland; secondly, because it attacks the rights and the property of a large number of the people of Ireland. I am prepared to maintain that this Bill, which is brought in for the professed object of lessening drunkenness in Ireland, will be the means of increasing it, and that it will not stop the sale of drink in Ireland on Sundays, but merely transfer the sale from a large number of small and industrious shopkeepers to the Munster houses and shebeen houses. It will increase drunkenness, because the article to be found in the shebeen houses will be of the very worst description, and there is no control over these houses as there is over regular licensed victuallers in Ireland. I will refer to a Return which has been obtained by the Lord Lieutenant of the county of Limerick, a gentleman who is well known in this House, the present Lord Emly. In the county which I represent (Limerick) there are 14 parishes in the diocese of Cashel and Emly in which Sunday closing is carried out at present, and has been for some time past. There is another large part of that county where the public-houses are opened on Sundays as they have always been. A Return was asked for by Lord Emly from the different petty session clerks of petty sessions districts of the archdiocese of Emly, where the public-houses are closed, and that part of the diocese of Limerick where the public-houses are open on Sundays. There is, first of all, Patrickswell, in the diocese of Limerick, with a population of 5,447, and the convictions for drunkenness there, according to this Return, were 1 in 286; while in the archdiocese of Hospital, with a population of 5,790, the convictions for drunkenness were 1 in 156. In New Pallas, in the diocese of Cashel and Emly, where closing is adopted, the convictions for drunkenness were 1 in 212, in a population of 10,520; while at the same time in the petty session district of Abbyeale, with a population of 10,294, the convictions for drunkenness were 1 in 572, against 1 in 156 in Hospital, which is in the archdiocese where there is Sunday closing. The next is the petty session district of Munroe. The convictions there in the archdiocese of Cashel were 1 in 833, with a population of 6,665; while in Bruree, with a population of 4,426, the convictions were only 1 in 1,475. Or, in other words, in places where there was Sunday closing the convictions for drunkenness were 1 in 833, and where the public-houses were open the convictions were only 1 in 1,475, or a little more than one-half. In the next case I find in Ballyneety, with a population of 7,430, the convictions were only 1 in 391; while in Glin, with a similar population, there was only 1 conviction in 517. I need not go fuller into this, Sir. But the reason of these figures is very readily accounted for. If you prevent the respectable public-houses from opening on Sunday you drive the people who want to get refreshment and to get drunk into the shebeen houses, and you increase intoxication, because men who take home drink with them on Saturday night will give it to their wives and children, and they will be taught to drink, so that this Bill brought in for the purpose of lessening drunkenness will go far to increase it. I want to know what has been shown to this House to lead it to believe that this Bill will lessen intoxication? I believe there is not one man in this Assembly who would not vote for any measure which he thinks would have that effect. I believe this measure is an infringement of the liberties of the people, which will destroy the property of 16,000 or 18,000 of our fellow-countrymen without offering them any compensation in return, and I trust the Government will not allow so unfair and unjust a measure to pass even the second reading in this House. I beg to move the rejection of the Bill.

Amendment proposed, to leave out "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day six months."—(Mr. O'Sullivan.)

MR. MURPHY: I beg leave to support the Amendment of the hon. Member for Limerick. I will not go into a discussion of the provisions of the Bill, but will remind hon. Members that this question has already been referred to a Select Committee of this House. If the whole question had not been gone into the last few years, and if that Select Committee had not unanimously reported against the provisions of this Bill—more than half of whom, when appointed, were in favour of Sunday closing—I think then there would be no farther occasion for taking any part in this discussion. But, as I understand the matter, it is this: The hon. Member for Londonderry (Mr. R. Smyth) has thrown out something like—I cannot call it an official—intimation, but something like an intimation, that the Chief Secretary for Ireland intended, if this Bill passes a second reading, to move that at least two portions of it, dealing with certain towns, be referred to a Select Committee to inquire into and report whether or not these towns shall be exempted from the operation of the Bill. That is what I understood the hon. Member to say.

MR. RICHARD SMYTH: I merely quoted substantially, as well as I could remember, the language employed by the right hon. Gentleman on Friday evening.

MR. MURPHY: I think it is right that the House should be put into possession of what has already occurred in relation to this matter. In 1867 this Bill was brought into this House for the first time. It was allowed to be read a second time on the distinct understanding that it should be referred to a Select Committee. That Select Committee was appointed, and evidence was taken before it, and, as I before observed, it was unanimously recommended that the principle of total Sunday closing should not be adopted, but that a modification of the hours of closing should be recommended. Upon the lines of that Report the legislation which took place so lately as 1872 was founded, and it was then believed that that was a final settlement of the question—at least, for some years to come. I will inform the House that all the Petitions which have been presented upon this subject—this great mass of so-called public opinion, to which the hon. Member for Londonderry has referred—these Petitions are, I believe, nothing more than the emanation of a systematised plan of action pursued by various associations, who, with ample funds at command, and with every possible means of procuring signatures, have been most industriously employed in getting them up. But looking at every Petition presented to this House in favour of this measure, what do I find? I find that they contain nothing in the world more than an expression of opinion on the part of the signatories that the closing of public-houses on Sundays would do that which every Member of this House is anxious to do—no more so than myself—repress intemperance. The question before the House is this—not what may be the belief of the signatories to those Petitions, but what is it as a matter of fact? Would the measure have the effect which those who have signed the Petitions say they believe it will have? Now, if I can show that so far from this belief being correct, it is directly, absolutely contrary to the evidence founded on official Returns from those who have the best opportunity of ascertaining the facts, I do say that this House ought not to give their undivided attention to that expression of opinion. The gentlemen who have signed do not know anything of the subject, but merely “believe” the case to be as set forth; and they express that opinion to the House. I will mention one fact. On the Select Committee which sat in 1868 the chief authorities in Dublin were examined—Mr. O’Ferrall, the Head Commissioner of Police, the Chief Inspectors of the Constabulary, and others, and what was their opinion? They stated broadly and openly that so far from closing public-houses there being of any use it would absolutely intensify the evil; and they further stated that a great amount of drunkenness took place at the very hour when the public-houses were closed. Now, I mention that fact merely that this House may not be led away by the opinions of gentlemen, however sincere they may be, upon a question which is simply a matter of fact, and not of opinion. A very strange incident occurred in that evidence given before the Select Committee. Gentlemen in this House have often heard, and are perfectly aware, that in the archdiocese of Cashel the late Archbishop of that diocese succeeded in establishing a voluntary system of closing public-houses on Sunday. The Archbishop was examined before that Committee, and, in answer to a question, he stated that he came there prepared with statistics which he had got from his diocese, commencing with 1861, when the suppression of public-houses began, and ending in 1868—a period of seven years—and he said the effect of closing these houses had been to reduce the number of committals by one-half. But what, moreover, did he show? Because these figures are most useful by way of contrast and comparison with other places where the system of closing public-houses did not prevail. Why, in one instance, in one small town in the county of Tipperary, where the inhabitants were about 6,000 or 8,000, the number of committals for drunkenness on Sundays was exactly double the number in the city of Cork on Sundays with a population of 90,000 inhabitants. I merely mention that as a matter for inquiry, and to show that we must not take for granted what these numerous Petitioners have asserted, that the closing of public-houses on Sundays would diminish drunkenness. This House is, and always has been, anxious to effect social reforms; and we are all united in an earnest desire to see how best to check intemperance. I say, therefore, that if this Bill be read a second time, to refer the subject again to a Select Committee to inquire into and report. If the authors of this measure are so satisfied that public opinion is with them, if they can produce absolute striking proof that the closing of public-houses would effect their object, for Heaven’s sake let them have the benefit of it, and not extend the measure to large towns. Let there be no fragment of an inquiry; let it be an open inquiry as in 1868; let those who are best qualified to give an opinion be summoned upon it, and let those who support these Petitions show the grounds of their belief. I feel it my duty, under existing circumstances, to oppose the second reading of this Bill. I do not believe it will effect the end desired. I do not believe that the parties for whose professed advantage it is sought to pass it require it. I presented a Petition to the House this evening signed by 14,000 working men and inhabitants of Cork against the Bill, and I simply ask—Is that any evidence of the great popular opinion in favour of it? I should rather think it was to the contrary. But, be that as it may, I protest against the passing of the measure. It will not effect the object; it will increase drunkenness, and intensify the evil while it professes to bring about good. It will despotically interfere with the habits and convenience of the large majority who are temperate, and will not prevent the intemperate from indulging in their courses, but rather stimulate them to an evasion of such a law, if passed. And, above all, there is another question mixed up with this. A large and influential trade has grown up under the sanction of the law; men have invested their capital largely in a legitimate trade, and if this Bill passes into law it will sweep away one-seventh of the entire profits of that trade. This House is asked to do, with respect to those who have invested their money, that which it has never yet done in any analogous case—namely, to deprive a body of men of the fruit of their investment and industry without any compensation whatever. The case of commissions in the Army were dealt with. Everybody knows that the sale of these commissions was absolutely illegal by Act of Parliament, yet a custom grew up, and what did this House do? It did not attempt to deprive the Army of that which had obtained a value, although it was illegal. In contradistinction to that, how is this question to be treated? No Committee is to be appointed on the subject, and these legal traders are to be deprived of their right. I do earnestly trust that the House will not come to that conclusion of forfeiting a man's property for what will be found to be an ideal and not a real good. Let men turn their attention to the repression of vice and intemperance by every means, if they can; let them look after the comfort of the people, find increasing recreation for them on the Sunday, and let them not oppose the opening of public parks. A great many men in favour of this measure oppose the increase of recreation for the people, and all kinds of innocent enjoyment which would be the best possible means of repressing intemperance. I protest against this Bill on this principle—that it of necessity lays down the doctrine that the great mass of the people in Ireland are intemperate. There is no reason for the passage in the Bill that the majority of those who frequent public-houses are intemperate. Let us legislate not for a minority but for a majority, and do not let the vices of the few override the comfort and convenience of the many. If this measure should pass, I warn this House that it will give rise to a similar feeling to that which visited England when a similar Bill was passed almost sub silentio, and the people rose almost in rebellion, and the Bill had to be repealed within six months. I will not detain the House longer, but beg leave to say that I shall support the Amendment of the hon. Member for Limerick.

MAJOR O'GORMAN: I should like to say one or two words on this subject. This Bill—by-the-bye I have not seen it; I understand it is only printed to-day—this Bill is brought in for the purpose of soberising the people of Ireland. Now, let us see the way in which it professes to soberise the people of Ireland. It distinctly states this to the people of Ireland—"You—men, women, and children—drink as much whisky, beer, porter, everything intoxicating, as ever you like upon Monday, Tuesday, Wednesday, Thursday, Friday, Saturday, and Sunday, but do not go into a public-house licensed by Her Majesty on Sunday, and you will be sober." That is the Bill; nobody can deny it. It allows everyone, old or young, to drink in his own house or in the house of his friend on Sunday, to bring his children to his friend's house, to bring his friend's children to his own house, and allows them to drink as much as they desire. There is nothing in this Bill which prevents their drinking where they like—drink in the field, drink sub Jove frigido. But do not drink on Sunday in places licensed by Her Majesty. I would remind hon. Members that the licences in Ireland are given with a certain degree of care for the people. A man is obliged to show that his house is comfortable, that he has good tables and good chairs, and is in a position to receive people comfortably on Sundays. The people who are licensed have to pay a large sum of money. Is faith to be broken with these traders? Sir, I say this Bill is an insult to the Queen herself. [Laughter.] I do say so, because the private houses of individuals are not licensed, and the liquor must be got somewhere. Where is it got? The hon. Member tells us where it is to be got. He says—"Go out on Saturday and get it. Fill your houses full of it. Drink it on Sundays, but do not drink in public-houses." That is the essence of the Bill. Now, I ask, is that a Bill likely to soberise the people of Ireland or any other country where it is adopted? It is not, Sir. For that reason, therefore, and I am most desirous of showing my anxiety for the sobriety of the people, I oppose the second reading of this Bill.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH: I have always been very doubtful how far this measure will soberise the people of Ireland, and I have expressed my views upon that question more than once. But I think that the hon. and gallant Member who has last spoken has somewhat forgotten that it might be urged as an argument against his position that drinking in a field, sub Jove frigido, is not quite so tempting a thing as in a snug corner of a public-house—[Major O'GORMAN: In summer.]—and I suspect that the argument of the hon. Member for Londonderry (Mr. R. Smyth) would be that if comfort were diminished, drinking also would diminish. It occurred to me, from the speeches of the last three hon. Members who have addressed us, that they scarcely appreciate the position which this question has reached. Now, the House will remember that last Session, when the hon. Member for Londonderry made a Motion on this subject, I stated, on behalf of the Government, our views with regard to it, and I made a counter proposal to limit the hours of opening public-houses on Sunday. That proposal was fully discussed, and the House, by a large majority, expressed their preference for the Bill of the hon. Member for Londonderry. That, Sir, is one fact which the Government are bound to consider, and to which I hope the House will think they have shown proper deference. But still there is another fact. The hon. Member for the city of Cork (Mr. Murphy) spoke of what was likely to happen if a Bill were passed upon this subject sub silentio. Now, I doubt whether any question has engaged the attention of the House during the past three years upon which it could less be said that a Bill was likely to pass sub silentio. At any rate, I feel sure of this, that every person in Ireland has had by this time a full opportunity of knowing of the proposal for total Sunday closing of public-houses in Ireland, and of the probability that a measure would be passed upon the subject. Yet, Sir, I am bound to say that, although I do not attribute to the expressions of opinion which have been referred to by the hon. Member for Londonderry quite as much weight as he does, still I do attribute very great weight, indeed, to this, that there have been hardly any expressions of opinion on the other side. During the past autumn and winter—when certainly there must have appeared to people who take interest in this question every probability of the passing of a measure with regard to it—there have been, as far as I know, very few expressions of opinion on the subject at all, except those elicited by the advocates of Sunday closing. Well, looking at the matter from this point of view, I think the Government are justified in adhering to the decision at which they arrived last Session—that they would accept the judgment which was arrived at by the House on an occasion when they, to the best of their power, put their views of the matter fully before the House—that they would accept, I say, that judgment, and would allow this experiment to be tried. Then, Sir, I come to the point how far it is to be tried. Now, the House will remember that I stated last Session that in my view, based upon reasons which appeared to me sufficient, it was not advisable that total Sunday closing should be adopted in the larger towns. I based that view upon information which had been supplied to me in the ordinary way by magistrates and police authorities in those towns. I think there is great reason to fear that if a Bill for the total closing of public-houses in Ireland on Sunday was passed, with reference, we will say, to the city of Dublin, the towns of Belfast, Limerick, Waterford, and Cork, one of these two things would happen—either there would be great and widespread evasion of the law, than which I can conceive nothing more detrimental to the cause of law and order in Ireland, or else, if the law were thoroughly enforced, there would be no little danger of riotous proceedings, which I am sure we should all deplore. Well, Sir, I based that opinion upon information which has been supplied to me. I never had an opportunity of fully stating that information to the House when I made the proposal which I felt it my duty to make last Session, that towns of above 10,000 population should be exempted from the operation of the Bill, and that the hours of opening public-houses in those towns should be merely restricted by a period of two hours. I am bound to admit that that proposal was not very favourably received. On the one hand, it was objected to by the advocates of total Sunday closing; on the other hand, it was objected to by some of those who opposed it; and I felt myself in the difficulty of being obliged, as I conceived in the interest of law and government, to make a proposal which, as it seemed then, might not be favourably received by the House. I am anxious—and I am sure in this the hon. Member for Londonderry will agree with me—that this experiment, if tried, should be tried with safety—that we should not go farther than we think, on the best evidence we can obtain, we can safely go. I feel the importance of placing before the House and the country all that can be said upon the subject by those who have had any special experience in the administration of the present law. I do not think that that opportunity would be afforded to me merely in a speech on a second reading or in Committee on the Bill; and, therefore, the proposal I make to the hon. Member for Londonderry and the House is this—that the Bill should be referred, after the second reading, to a Select Committee, that it there should be thoroughly considered and sifted, and should be adapted to what are admitted to be the different circumstances of town and country; but that that Committee should not, as has been suggested by the hon. Member for Cork, enter fully ab initio into the whole question of Sunday closing in Ireland—that we should take as settled the adoption of the principle of total Sunday closing, and that we should confine the evidence to be taken before that Committee to information bearing upon the applicability of the measure to those towns, the Dublin metropolitan police district, Belfast, Cork, Limerick, and Waterford in which, I am bound to say, there is by far the most danger that, if applied, it would not give satisfaction. In making this suggestion I can assure the House that I have no wish to delay the progress of the Bill. The present, however, is a very early period of the Session, and the Committee may enter upon their inquiry with every prospect that their work would be concluded before Easter, and the Bill may then return to the House and pass its several stages during the present Session. I am as anxious as the hon. Member himself that a question which has been so long agitated should be now finally settled, and that the experiment which the House last Session decided to make should be entered upon under the most favourable conditions of success. For these reasons alone I have made the proposal to refer the Bill to a Select Committee after it has passed a second reading.

MR. MELDON said, he confessed he had heard the statement of the Chief Secretary for Ireland with considerable satisfaction. The assurance he had given in the name of the Government that the question should be finally settled, and that they would not impede the progress of the Bill, was one that must give satisfaction to all their supporters. He must say he had been one of the most earnest and most strenuous supporters of the Bill, and one of them who had urged that they should give way in nothing, but that the Bill should be carried through in its entirety. They had no hesitation in saying, however, that if the Select Committee was appointed, the present Session would see them in possession of the Bill in its entirety. There were one or two points of view from which they might look on the proposed Select Committee. In the first place, from the point of view, as suggested by the right hon. Baronet, that it would be impossible to work out the Bill as it was at present framed; the second was the way in which the Bill might be made most useful and most beneficial for those who wished for it. He was perfectly willing to take an inquiry on this subject from either of these points of view, as he was confident they could, upon an inquiry whether such a Bill was wanted in the large towns or not, produce the strongest and most overwhelming evidence that it was most wanted in the large towns, and particularly in the city of Dublin. Were those places left out of the Bill, there would immediately be an outcry, and especially would there be one in Dublin, as soon as it was known that it was to be made a drinking place into which all those who desired drink might drift in on Sundays from Rathmines, Kingstown, and other townships near Dublin. Speaking of Dublin alone, it would be horrible to contemplate such a state of things. It might be, however, that there were reasons that would make it essential and necessary that Dublin and those large towns should be excluded; but if there were, he thought it most important that they should be laid before the House and before the Committee, and that it should be demonstrated that the passing of the Bill would seriously prejudice public interests or public convenience. He was most anxious that the Bill should pass, and especially that, when passed, it should be a success; and he certainly said, for himself, he was most anxious that the Committee's proposition that had been made should be accepted in that House that night, and he trusted the hon. Member for Londonderry (Mr. R. Smyth) would see his way to accept it.

MR. COLLINS said, he had listened with great satisfaction to the remarks of the hon. Member for the county Kildare (Mr. Meldon), who had taken an active part in the promotion of this measure; and when he found that a Gentleman whose experience on this subject induced him to accept as fair and reasonable the proposition that had been stated to the House by the Chief Secretary for Ireland, he confessed it seemed to him to be unnecessary for himself, who up to this time had taken a view of the question which was the opposite to that of the hon. Member, to discuss the matter further. He should not have spoken on the present occasion, but for an observation that had fallen from the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary. He altogether concurred in the advisability of a Select Committee to deal with this subject; but he should greatly regret that the scope of that inquiry should be strictly limited to the effect the Bill might have on the large Irish towns to which the right hon. Gentleman had referred. Those five large corporate towns—Dublin, Belfast, Limerick, Cork, and Waterford—were, of course, very proper and suitable subjects of inquiry by a Select Committee; but there were other towns also to which he would ask the consideration of the Chief Secretary similarly circumstanced with those he had named, but which he had omitted from consideration by the Select Committee. He did not desire to raise points of discussion, but would appeal to the Chief Secretary to extend the scope of the inquiry, and not to limit it too strictly to the towns he had named. He feared much that if it was limited too strictly there would be great dissatisfaction among the inhabitants of considerable towns which would be injuriously affected by the Bill. He could only say that if the inquiry was to be so strictly limited in that way he should have no alternative but to oppose any proposition of the kind.

MR. CHARLES LEWIS said, that though he thought the Bill ought to be allowed to pass through the House in the ordinary way; still, as he understood its supporters were prepared to accept the recommendation that had been given them from the Treasury Bench, he should not oppose it. He thought, however, they should clearly understand what they were about. The statement of the hon. Member for Kinsale (Mr. Collins) showed the difficulty they would drift into if the terms of reference were not made clear. The hon. Member was the worthy Representative of one of the smallest constituencies in the Kingdom, and wanted the Bill to be so framed that persons might go before the Committee and give reasons why very small towns should be exempted from it. It appeared to him that the lines on which this great question was to be settled were perfectly well understood not only in that House, but out of it; but if they did not lay down those lines, they might be re-opening the whole question before the Select Committee, and the question might be treated in a very unsatisfactory way. He was not quite able to understand the extent of the suggestion of the Chief Secretary for Ireland. They knew that last Session the right hon. Baronet had great tenderness of heart for cities of 10,000 population and upwards; but in the case of Londonderry the gift had not been received with gratitude—the citizens there saying they were much obliged, but would rather not have it. Within the last few weeks the gift of being exempted from the Bill had been repudiated at a large meeting of the inhabitants. He was bound to mention that, in view of the extraordinary statement that there was no evidence as to the state of public opinion on the main question. That House had hardly risen at the close of last Session when there was a large meeting of publicans in Dublin, who took heart of grace and subscribed £2,000 to set public opinion going on the question, and enable the public to state their grievances against the Bill, and take measures for defending their rights and privileges, which were supposed by some persons in that House to be connected with the unlimited opening of public-houses. He had looked to the newspapers in Ireland for the results of that £2,000 subscription, but from what he could see there had been no outcome from it in the shape of public meetings and resolutions passed at them, and they might take it that, after asking for the delay of another Session to test the reality of public feeling in Ireland, the opponents of this measure had not been able to carry any expression of public opinion in their favour. He should have been well content that this great question as to the extent of Sunday closing should be decided by the House, instead of being referred to a Select Committee. Almost every Member of the House had voted either for or against the Bill on former occasions, and it would be difficult, if not impossible, to obtain a satisfactory and impartial Committee. The whole point was contained in this one question—Were there not overwhelming reasons why, if they determined to close in the counties, they should not also close in the towns?

SIR GEORGE BOWYER observed that, as on most other subjects, much might be said in favour of the Bill, and much also against it. The subject had been so much debated, however, that he did not think they wanted any long discussion on it. Now the more so, as he thought that if there was one subject on which more than another there was a preponderating body of evidence in Ireland, it was on this very question. He did not say public opinion was unanimous on the question in Ireland; but there was a preponderance of opinion in favour of the Bill. In proof of that he might mention that in the county he represented, he meant in the diocese of Ferns, public-houses had been closed on Sunday for a long time by Episcopal authority—the authority of the Catholic Bishop of Ferns, but with the full consent and approval of the people of all denominations. That was strong evidence in favour of the Bill from one of the largest counties in Ireland. With respect to the suggestion of the hon. Member for Kinsale (Mr. Collins), for extending the scope of the inquiry of the Committee, he thought it would be better not to do so; because, if the Committee were allowed a great scope, it would occupy a long time, and there would be no satisfactory result. It was quite enough to take some of the large towns as typical of the rest. He hoped the Committee would be able to come to a practicable conclusion within a reasonable time.

MR. SULLIVAN said, he hoped the House would appreciate the indisposition of the supporters of the Bill to enter into any lengthened discussion just now, and that their abstention would not be quoted against them hereafter. They took it that the discussion was virtually concluded by the proposition now before the House; but it was indispensable for the character of the Government and the success of the measure, that they should understand exactly the terms of the reference. They were, first, that the Bill was accepted in principle; secondly, that the inquiry was only as to the five large towns of Ireland; and, thirdly, how and when to apply total Sunday closing in those towns in such a manner as to lead to a successful issue. He hoped it would not be taken to be a subject of inquiry whether those five towns were to be excluded in toto from the operation of the Bill; for, as the hon. Member for Londonderry City (Mr. Charles Lewis) had shown, it would not be deemed a benefit to some of the cities proposed to be excluded. They could not follow the hon. and gallant Member for Waterford (Major O'Gorman) and the hon. Member for Cork (Mr. Murphy) into the general discussion of the merits of the Bill; but as statistics had been quoted on the authority of Lord Emly, he would observe that there was nothing more misleading than imperfect statistics. The House had not been told by the hon. Member for Limerick County (Mr. O'Sullivan) that those statistics referred to only two months of the year 1874, and to two months of the year 1876; and with regard to the two parishes of Hospital and New Pallas, he might say that they were famous for the riots of the Three-Year-Old and the Four-Year-Old, factions that had given plenty of employment to Her Majesty's justices, and also to the ecclesiastical authorities. No two more combative parishes could have been selected, and as for Lord Emly's statistics, his brother Poor Law Guardians evinced their appreciation of them by carrying a Petition in favour of the Bill, though not unanimously. Reference had been made to the probability of rioting in Ireland consequent upon the passing of this Bill; but he thought the hon. and gallant Member for Waterford was altogether wrong in endeavouring to make the House suppose that there would be rioting in Ireland in order that the people might enjoy the ancient privilege of getting drunk.

MAJOR O'GORMAN: I rise to Order, Sir. I never said anything of the sort. I detest drunkenness as much as the hon. Member does.

MR. SULLIVAN begged the hon. and gallant Member's pardon if he had at all misunderstood him. As to all these prophecies about rioting put forward to alarm the House, no doubt they were not slow in rioting in Ireland occasionally; but he proudly affirmed that he never knew the Irish people break into riot for the sake of drink. Riots of that character had taken place in other parts of the Empire—there had been disturbances in England a few years ago when early closing in the week days was enforced. But once again he proudly claimed that no one could point to an instance in which tumult or disorder had resulted from applying restrictions to drinking in Ireland.

MR. GOULDING observed that the clergy of all denominations had asked for the Bill, and a majority of the working men were in favour of it; and if the large cities were to be exempted from it, they would be made the receptacle of all who wished to indulge in drink.

MR. RICHARD SMYTH regarded the proposals as being made in good faith, and he was quite sure that the right hon. Baronet was anxious to have a Bill carried through the House during the present Session. He was confident that he might rely on the assurance of the Chief Secretary that the scope of the instructions to the Committee would not be enlarged under any pressure whatever. He thought that, all things considered, they had reason to be in a measure satisfied with the proposal from the Treasury Bench; and he hoped the Committee would make such a Report to the House as would not only enable Her Majesty's Government to fulfil their duties and keep the peace in Ireland, but give satisfaction to the supporters of the Bill. With these observations he begged to recommend all his hon. Friends who had interested themselves in this measure to accept the proposals of the Government.

LEAVE. FIRST READING.

MR. SCLATER BOOTH, in rising to move for leave to bring in a Bill to "consolidate and amend the Laws relating to the Valuation of Property for the purposes of Rates and Taxes," said, he would refer very briefly to the fate which befell the measure of a similar character which he introduced in the first week of the Session last year. He could assure the House that the measure which was then proposed by him, and unreservedly assented to and approved by the Government, was bond fide intended to be proceeded with in the usual course, and, if possible, to be passed into law. At all events, it was intended to take the opinion of the House upon it in the early part of last Session; but about the time when the second reading should have come on, the debates on the Royal Titles Bill interfered very much with the Government Order of Business, and before another opportunity arrived for bringing it on, great interest was exhibited on the subject, both in the form of Petitions to the House and of deputations to himself, showing that the matter could not be brought to a final issue without a much greater expenditure of the time at the disposal of the Government than he could have hoped to secure for his Bill. Again, the Highways Bill was introduced before Easter, but the two Bills were correlative and required to be proceeded with simultaneously. On these grounds it was determined not to proceed with the measure last year, (and he hoped that the time spent on its details might not have been spent in vain, and that the communications which he had received would so far have conduced to a satisfactory result that he might be enabled to present the Bill this Session in a shape more likely to escape the opposition to which it had been formerly liable, and to facilitate its passage through the House. In introducing it last year he had referred to the precedent of previous measures introduced by successive Governments upon the same principle—namely, by the Government of Lord Derby, of the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Gladstone) and of the present Government. Measures had been laid before Parliament by the present First Lord of the Admiralty (Mr. Hunt), by the right hon. Gentleman opposite, who was then President of the Poor-Law Board, (Mr. Goschen), and afterwards by the right hon. Gentleman succeeding him in that office (Mr. Stansfeld) in order to carry the same principle into effect. He also relied a good deal, in submitting the measure to the House, upon the absurdity of the present system which it was proposed to supersede. That absurdity was, in short, this, that for the purposes of taxation, they had now the same description of property valued by three different authorities upon three different principles or bases of valuation. He did not wish, however, to rely exclusively upon that ground of argument—the symmetry and simplicity of their system—they had also to consider the wishes and feelings of the people. Symmetry in their system of government was not the first thing to be considered; but he thought that when it could be combined with administrative improvement it was a very desirable thing. The history of recent legislation upon the subject of these Bills was an interesting one. When the Poor Law Amendment Bill was passed some 40 or 45 years ago attention began to be more and more directed, than had hitherto been the case, to the systematic levying and expenditure of parish rates. Accordingly, within a few years of the passing of that celebrated measure, a Bill on the subject of local valuation was introduced and passed through the House by Mr. Poulett Scrope. That was in the year 1837, and the Bill laid down the principle defining what should be the basis on which the gross estimated rental should be calculated in terms which have been copied and never have been objected to in subsequent Acts of Parliament. It was effective for its object, but within a very few years it came to pass that some of the charges which had been cast on the parochial area alone were extended to the Poor Law Union area. In 1861 some very important changes in the law were accomplished by the transfer of the charge of lunatics to the Common Fund of the Union, and it was also provided by the same statute that the several parishes should contribute to the common fund in proportion to their rateable value. The additional importance thus given to the Common Fund in 1861 led to the necessity of a further important change in the law which was effected by the Union Assessment Act of 1862. By that Act the duty of assessment or valuation was transferred from the parish to the Union authorities. That Act was amended in 1864, and he mentioned that circumstance only for the purpose of stating that on his (Mr. Sclater-Booth's) Motion, an important clause was introduced into the Act, which required that the valuation list of the several Unions should be transmitted regularly to the clerk of the peace of the county. By the Act of 1865 the whole charge for the maintenance of the poor was transferred from the parish to the Union area. That was a most important change in the law and was made with the consent of both sides of the House. Two years after the passing of the Union Chargeability Act it was found necessary by his right hon. Friend, now Secretary of State for War, to avail himself of a Common Fund, levied over the whole Metropolis to an extent and in a way which experience had shown to have been productive of the most beneficial and valuable results. In 1867, therefore, we had a Common Fund set up for 30 or 40 of the most important Unions in the Kingdom, extending over the most important Province of the country and over an area containing one-seventh at least of England as regarded population. The House, however, would easily see that at that time there was no security that the various Unions in the metropolis would be rated on similar principles, and therefore one of the first Departmental acts of his right hon. Friend opposite (Mr. Goschen) was to pass through the House in 1869 a Valuation Act which provided the necessary securities that the Common Fund of the metropolis should be satisfactorily assessed and levied without any reasonable cause of complaint on the part of the various contributory Unions. Now, under the Metropolis Act it was provided that the inhabited house duty and the property tax should be collected upon the valuation lists as settled by the various Union authorities. Therefore, under that Act we had the payers of the property tax under Schedule A and the payers of the inhabited house duty in the metropolis paying on a more accurately determined basis than the payers of those taxes in the country at large. A further illustration might be drawn from that Act. The three counties of Kent, Surrey, and Middlesex had an aggregate valuation of £29,000,000, and the contributions to the county rate were levied in these three counties according to the valuation lists which prevailed in them, except in those portions which lay within the metropolitan area. The portions of these counties which lay within the metropolitan area were four times as great as those outside, as regarded rateable value. The consequence of the present law was that, taking these counties, the ratepayers within the metropolis were paying at a higher ratio than the ratepayers outside it in the rural parts of the counties. The rateable valuation of the three counties was, as he had said, £29,000,000; that of the metropolis within these counties was £21,000,000. Another practical reason why it was important at the present time to proceed with this measure was that the expenditure under the operation of the Sanitary Acts was rapidly and daily increasing in importance. There were many local board districts constructed in times past which overlapped the borders of two or more Unions, and we had this anomaly—that the local board was now restricted by the Public Health Act to the valuation lists, as settled by the assessment committees of the Unions, so that the rate is levied by the local board authority upon the different bases which may happen to obtain within their area. Another reason which would commend itself to the House was that the want of this Valuation Bill stood in the way of very considerable administrative reforms which were otherwise necessary. For instance, under the Poor Law Amendment Act there was power to take a parish from one Union and to put it into another, and recently there was a case where a parish was added to an outside Union; objection, however, had been taken to the transfer, because of the transfer of burdens which it involved under the different valuations in the two Unions in question. Again, under the Act of last year additional powers were conferred on the Local Government Board in respect of the redistribution of parishes and adding them to other Unions; but for the want of larger powers, improvements like these were constantly hampered. For instance, it was obvious that the highway rate ought to be charged upon districts instead of upon parishes, in order to secure its equal pressure, but that could scarcely be done until there was a more uniform valuation of the property through which those highways ran. These new valuation lists were desirable as the basis on which to assess the property and income tax, and last year he had stated that the Government were willing to base the property tax on the valuation list; but that, if so, they ought to have some voice in preparing the list. There were other grounds why this should be, for it might surprise some hon. Members to hear that the Government were now the largest ratepayers in the Kingdom. He did not now speak only of the subventions paid by the State in aid of local rates, toward the cost of police, lunatics, and other local charges, which would alone give the Government a right to look somewhat jealously to the valuations throughout the country generally. But the Government were now assessed, or rather paid contributions in lieu of rates, to a considerable extent, the rateable value of the property on which they regularly contributed being not less than £586,000, situated in 345 parishes, and probably not fewer than 200 Unions, scattered over the whole of the country. The Government, therefore, had some right to require that the valuation of the Kingdom should be placed upon a sound footing, be governed by similar principles, and assessed by similar authorities, and with equal justice. Upon all these grounds the Government had come to the conclusion that the want of a proper Valuation Bill prevented administrative improvements which might otherwise be made under existing powers and under powers which might hereafter be conferred. The intention of the Bill was not to vary the principles of valuation at present recognized, but only to make them more effective, more uniform, and more equal. It would contain two main provisions—first, the empowering of the Government officer or surveyor of taxes who would have some voice in furnishing information and in objecting to the different valuation lists as prepared by the overseers, and, secondly, that a certain scale of deductions laid down in the Schedule should not be departed from, more or less. These two provisions would insure greater uniformity in the two columns of the rate-book—namely, gross rental and rateable value. The Government had been urged last Session by his hon. Friend the Member for South Norfolk (Mr. Clare Read) to adopt a principle which was said to have worked well in Scotland by setting up a new system of valuation by means of County Boards. Having considered the subject, however, with great attention, he was unable to adopt this system. In his opinion the Union was a quite sufficiently large area to be administered for the purpose of valuation. It was well known that for the last 40 years the Guardians had been entrusted with very large administrative duties; they had with much justice and accuracy revalued the different Unions; had put the existing law into operation upon their sole authority, besides having a large portion of local expenditure to collect, control, and be accountable for to their constituents; and had exercised those powers with so much justice, that he saw no ground for disestablishing them from their present position with regard to valuation, or for entrusting that duty to a body representing the larger but uncertain area of a county. A county body could not have the same minute knowledge of the detailed circumstances of different localities, and would, as he thought, so far fail to give satisfaction that even a Government officer would be considered preferable as a guiding authority upon the subject. As a rule, throughout the Kingdom the county administration did not exercise the powers they now possessed for effecting a county valuation upon their own authority. A Return issued upon this subject at the instance of the hon. Member for Northumberland (Mr. Ridley) showed that in 12 counties of England and Wales the property tax valuation was relied on exclusively as the county rate basis. In 17 counties the valuation lists formed the basis, and in 17 others both those sources of information were resorted to. In five counties only was there a separate system of valuation, or any application of the powers which counties now possessed. The Bill, therefore, did really what the counties for the most part were doing for themselves, and the counties might well rely upon the valuation lists, just as the Government were prepared to look to the valuation lists for the property tax. The Guardians were now the sanitary authorities in rural districts; their functions had undergone an important change under the Public Health Act of 1875; and were scarcely to be distinguished from those of the councils which exercised similar authority in towns. Hon. Members knew that a very important change in regard to the Guardians was conferred upon them also by the Education Act of last year—that of appointing education committees, so that he could not see why they should not have the same functions as those enjoyed by town councils, but he was far from saying that improvements might not be made in the election of those bodies and the system generally, though he thought they must rely upon Union areas. Possibly the foundation might be laid for the establishment of a common County Fund, equally leviable over the whole county whether in one Union or the other. For the want of such a fund there was a difficulty in framing the Highways Bill, which he hoped shortly to introduce, and the principal feature of which would be the establishment of a common County Fund in aid of the principal highways of the county. There was also a growing difficulty in reference to the provision of accommodation for pauper lunatics. In the metropolis, provision had been made by means of the Common Fund for the proper and humane custody of 5,000 harmless chronic lunatics at a considerably less cost than was incurred in county lunatic asylums, and it would be easy hereafter under the provisions of the Bill he was explaining to spread similar charges in the same manner. Many Poor Law reformers were of opinion that a portion of the cost of maintaining habitual in-door paupers should be spread over a wider area than at present; but what he desired to do was to say generally, as the result of his experience in the Office over which he had the honour to preside, that there were other charges coming under different heads of local administration which might be dealt with in future measures, but the questions so involved were incidental to the present measure, the want of which stood in the way of a great deal of useful legislation, which the Government, the House, and the public might desire to see accomplished. He might mention before sitting down that since last year there had been many alterations in the draft of the Bill. In the Bill of last year it was proposed that rent should be regarded as the minimum of value, but this proposal had been omitted from the present Bill, although he did not disguise his opinion that rents rightly ascertained would, under the scheme of the Bill, be regarded more closely now than in former times as the true criterion of value. The Bill would also differ from that of last year as far as it described the status and functions of the surveyors of taxes in relation to the valuation lists. It would provide that in the different tribunals where objections to valuations contained in the lists were admissible the surveyors of taxes should take their places as ordinary objectors. In the Bill of last year it was proposed that the county magistrates should appoint committees to take part in the preparation of the valuation lists; but this was omitted from the present Bill, because the Government was satisfied from the opinion of many of the most experienced officials in the country that such a system was unnecessary; and it was proposed further that the re-valuations should be made once in five years instead of once in seven, as proposed in the Bill of last Session. A proposal in the Bill which was not contained in the measure of last year was one which would establish a means of appeal direct from the Assessment Commissioners to the High Court of Justice, where this course might be deemed necessary, in order to determine points of the highest importance as affecting the assessment of properties held by manufacturing, railway, canal, public companies, and other parties owning properties of great value. This had been done to save expense, and to secure uniformity in the principles upon which property was in future to be valued in the country generally; but in all cases ratepayers would have the same power of appeal as at present. In conclusion, he would make an appeal to the House whether, after the sifting which this measure had so anxiously and deliberately undergone throughout the whole of the country, they would exercise the power which they possessed of severely criticizing the 100 clauses which it contained. These clauses were for the most part re-enactments of existing laws. The Government did not propose to vary or depart from the principles which had been laid down by the Legislature for a great number of years. They only proposed to consolidate the present laws and to improve the administration of them, and thus to secure greater uniformity throughout the country—to bring, in short, the whole subject into one comprehensive code which should guide all local authorities in the execution of their most important duties. The Government had no wish to find fault as a general rule with the present administration of the laws, but they merely desired to improve a system of local government which had been somewhat neglected. In accepting the Bill he believed that the House would lay the foundation of a great deal of useful reform. He was sorry that he had had to trouble the House with so much detail, but he had felt it to be incumbent upon him to place the whole subject in the fullest way before them, and to express his earnest hope that the attention of the House would be directed to the new materials of the measure now placed before them, and that they would not be disposed, as he had before observed, to enter fully into the discussion of every clause and sentence, which, if done, might lead to a great and unnecessary waste of time. The right hon. Gentleman concluded by moving for leave to bring in the Bill.

MR. WHITBREAD said, he was sorry to find from the speech of the right hon. Gentleman that the Government had not advanced one step in reference to this subject since last Session. The Bill of the right hon. Gentleman would have to be criticised in detail on the second reading, and he would not, at this moment, discuss the question whether or not the Government had taken a wise step in associating a Government officer with those whose duty it would be to make the re-valuation. He wished, however, to touch upon the part of the right hon. Gentleman's speech which dealt with the future—he was afraid not the immediate future—of local government. Those who took an interest in these matters might be divided into two classes; one class would go at once to Imperial funds for every relief they could advocate, and the other class was composed of those who thought that any subventions from Government or Imperial relief of any kind would be utterly useless without great and far-reaching reforms in our system of local government. The first class would, doubtless, be gratified by the Government subvention proposed to be given under the provisions of the Prisons Bill; whereas the second class would find that all they had to trust to were the large but vague promises of the right hon. Gentleman which might or might not be carried into effect some three or four Sessions to come. If the Government stood still there was one thing, however, which never stood still, and he felt bound to direct the right hon. Gentleman's attention to the vast and rapidly increasing debt which had been incurred by the different local authorities, and he should be glad if the right hon. Gentleman would tell the House what was the total amount of the public indebtedness under that head; its rate of increase, and the estimated cost of the various claims which were being urged, and which would involve its still further increase. In his opinion, the policy of the Government was short-sighted and bad, because doling out a number of "sops" of the character proposed would have no effect in keeping down the rates. In the course of time people would not tolerate any further increase in the amount of the rates, and, consequently, works of the first necessity would have to remain unexecuted. He was, however, glad to find that the Government had adopted the Union as the unit of local self-government, though he thought that the indoor relief might have been cast upon a wider area. He regretted that the right hon. Gentleman had not touched upon the subject of the simplification of areas or on the means of connecting the different areas either by County Boards or by any other machinery, which would be the only way to secure economical management. He had no hope of any such economy being effected in the absence of such provisions, and trusted that the right hon. Gentleman would give the House an earnest for the fulfilment of his promises for the future by placing upon the Table a Bill which would give effect to the views of those who strenuously advocated local reforms.

SIR WALTER BARTTELOT thought that the right hon. Gentleman had placed his views very clearly before the House, while the statement of the hon. Member opposite (Mr. Whitbread) should have been reserved for the second reading of the Bill. He would refrain from discussing its provisions until they were laid before the House, and simply rose to express his opinion that the right hon. Gentleman had not shown that his Bill would place the rating of the country upon a sound and satisfactory basis, which was in truth the main reason for introducing the Bill. His principal objection to the measure was that it would leave the initiation of the assessment in the hands of the overseers as before. A very large practical experience had shown him that the rates in different Unions, although adjoining, were far from being equal, and in order that they might be placed upon a fair and reasonable footing there should be some fresh general valuation made throughout the counties. He approved the suggestion which had been made by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the City of London (Mr. Hubbard), last year, that the county and other local rates, as well as the income tax, should be made upon the ratable and not upon the gross estimated value of the property. The whole matter, however, was subject for further consideration, and he trusted it would receive that consideration and discussion before the Bill went into Committee.

MR. CLARE READ said, he wished to put the right hon. Gentleman right with regard to the nature of the Motion he had placed upon the Paper last year. By that Motion he had sought to have the powers of appeal which now appertained to quarter sessions transferred to County Representative Boards, and he must deny it would have the effect of extinguishing the present assessment committees. The right hon. Gentleman had hinted that it might be expected in the future that the expenditure for lunatics, main highways, and in-door poor would be spread over the counties. That, in itself, he thought, would be a very strong argument in favour of County Representative Boards.

MR. RATHBONE said, he shared in the disappointment expressed by the hon. Member for Bedford (Mr. Whitbread) at the meagre character of the measure. The right hon. Gentleman opposite, instead of proposing to give additional powers to local governments and to relieve them from that interference in details which was now overweighting his own Department, had brought forward a Bill which was likely to add even more work to that Department. The question of our local administrations was one of the great questions of the day; and he regretted that there was no sign, either out-of-doors or in the declaration of the Government, of an attempt being made to frame anything like a comprehensive scheme of reform on that subject and to work it out. Unless some systematic plan were laid down, all their legislation of that kind would do little more than add to the existing confusion. He did not say that what he suggested could be effected in a Session or two; but some general plan ought to be formed in the mind of the Government and then all their Bills should be made to work it out. To accomplish that object, with the least disturbance of existing interests and the least interference with popular prejudice, he thought it would probably be necessary to resort to the expedient of a Royal Commission.

MR. STANSFELD desired to guard himself against being supposed to agree with the last speaker that the best method of dealing with the large problem of local government would be by the issue of a Royal Commission on the subject. It would retard rather than advance legislation, and would in reality accomplish no solid good. He welcomed the Bill as far as it went, but it was not a sufficient instalment of reform of one of the most pressing questions of the day. He acknowledged it was a sound, useful, and business measure nevertheless, and in response to the appeal of the right hon. Gentleman, when it got into Committee it would be his duty to offer assistance, in order to secure its enactment. He had always endeavoured to look at questions connected with local government wholly irrespective of Party considerations; but he could not profess to be satisfied with that Bill, good and practical though it might be, as a sufficient instalment for the present Session of that reform of our system of local self-government which both the present and previous Governments had admitted to be necessary. He thought, on the contrary, that the time had come when some kind of plan, some outline of future, if not present, legislation should be devised which might give some encouragement and hope to those who took a deep interest in that great question. He regarded the proposal in the Bill to create a county fund with some jealousy, if there were to be no county representatives or administrative body to control its expenditure; and indeed he regarded with similar jealousy some of the other imperfect contrivances which the right hon. Gentleman had mentioned as substitutes for the time being of a greater measure of local government—the creation of some system of county administration. The sooner they addressed themselves to the creation of some system of county administration the better; and, therefore, either on the second reading of that Bill or on some other early opportunity, he should feel justified in drawing the attention of the House to the question of local government generally.

MR. SAMUDA observed that an important matter to be considered was this—that as a rate must be carried out with totally different machinery by the various Boards of Guardians, they would have what would really amount to a differential duty by reason of the Bill not clearly specifying that which should be rated and that which should be left out of rating. At the present time, for instance, machinery was rated in one parish but not in another, and it was of the utmost importance to the interests of trade that the matter should be settled. Even the law failed to deal with this satisfactorily, for when litigation had occurred there were most conflicting judgments, and even if they could be reconciled, it was of great importance that when a new start was made on the subject of rating, such as he conceived this Bill to propose, that it should be clearly settled by the Legislature to relieve all doubts, and he would say all excuses, for burdening trade with the vexatious exaction that was often sought to be imposed on it by treating machinery, the capital and stock-in-trade of the manufacturer and tenant, as a matter in any way subject to rates which were intended only to apply to freehold and leasehold property.

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH, in reply, said, he fully endorsed the sentiment expressed by the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Stansfeld), that these Departmental subjects ought to be discussed without Party bias. He would also remind the House, in answer to the right hon. Gentleman's remark that the Bill would be an insufficient instalment of reform in local taxation, that he proposed within a few days to re-introduce the Highways Bill of last year with some alterations. He should have been very glad if those two measures could have been passed last Session; but the right hon. Gentleman opposite must be aware of the difficulty which a Minister in charge of a particular Department had to contend with in securing sufficient time for the consideration by the House of the Bills he might have to bring in. Moreover, it should not be forgotten that since he had been at the Local Government Board he had succeeded in passing various measures connected with his Department through the House. Since coming into office the Government had passed several important measures akin to this subject, all of which he believed would be found to tend towards a harmonious whole. He therefore felt bound to protest against the assumption that they had practically done nothing. Apprehensions seemed to be entertained by some hon. Members with regard to an increase in the amount of local indebtedness; but the House ought to bear in mind that the great mass of local expenditure was incurred not by the Guardians, but by the town councils. On the whole, he believed the Union area would be found to be the most advantageous for the purpose in view; while with regard to the difficulty of rating machinery which had been alluded to by the hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets (Mr. Samuda), it would probably be smoothed away by the Bill, or, if it continued to exist, it would readily be settled by the easy, inexpensive, and simple form of appeal which was provided. If the Government had wanted to do nothing, they could not have done better than adopt the suggestion thrown out by the hon. Member for Liverpool (Mr. Rathbone), and refer the whole subject to a Royal Commission; but they preferred dealing with it to the best of their ability. By the adoption of that suggestion, legislation might have been looked for in the Greek Kalends. He had certainly in the course he had taken laid himself open to the charge of not producing a comprehensive measure; but he thought he had done enough in the way of detail to show that his attention had constantly been directed to this subject, and he had endeavoured so to shape the measures he had introduced as to make them fit in with the local administration of the future when it came to be dealt with on a large scale. He should certainly be very reluctant to commit the Government to a comprehensive scheme so long as he had not at his disposal the means of carrying it out. He had not those means at present, but the Bills he had brought forward had contributed, he believed, in a very material degree to the improvement and simplification of local government in this country; and if he had the good fortune to be able to pass this and one or two other measures which he proposed to introduce in the course of the Session, he hoped he might with propriety take credit to himself for having furnished an important contribution to what was undoubtedly a great and important work.

Motion agreed to.

Bill to consolidate and amend the Laws relating to the Valuation of Property for the purposes of Rates and Taxes, ordered to be brought in by Mr. SCLATER-BOOTH, Mr. CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER, and Mr. SALT.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 63.]

LEAVE. FIRST READING.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL, in rising to move for leave to bring in a Bill for consolidating with Amendments the Acts relating to Letters Patent for Inventions, observed that the Bill in many respects was a similar measure to, though not identical with, that introduced in "another place" by the Lord Chancellor in 1875, and which was again passed by the Upper House with some alterations last year. Everybody would acknowledge the importance and interest of the subject. The prosperity and pre-eminence of our manufactures was to a great extent due to the inventive genius of the people of this country; and if that prosperity and pre-eminence was to be maintained it would be necessary to protect and encourage inventions as far as that could be done judiciously and without imposing any undue fetter or restraint upon trade. At one time an opinion prevailed pretty extensively that to reward inventors by conferring on them the right exclusively to manufacture and sell their inventions was contrary to public policy and detrimental to the community, and that some other mode of rewarding inventive genius might be discovered. But within recent years the matter had been very fully and fairly discussed with an opposite result; and the Royal Commission of 1863 and the Select Committee of 1871 arrived at a conclusion favourable to the maintenance of the Patent Laws, though the latter body suggested several important alterations and Amendments in them. Additional evidence in favour of the expediency of maintaining Patent Laws was afforded by the fact that a number of gentlemen representing different countries and thoroughly conversant with the subject discussed the question in Vienna at the time of the Exhibition of 1873, and passed a resolution in favour of the principle of such laws. A similar opinion had been expressed at a number of meetings held since then in this country. He thought he might, therefore, assume that the feeling which prevailed some time ago antagonistic to the Patent Laws had died away, and that if there was not complete unanimity, there was at all events a preponderance of opinion now in their favour. Of course, the Bill which he proposed to introduce was framed on the theory that there ought to be some Patent Laws rewarding and encouraging inventors, and the only question really to be solved was how to frame them so as to secure the greatest possible benefit to the inventor without producing detriment and disadvantage to the manufacturer. Now, this was a Bill to consolidate, as well as to amend, the law; and, as the House was aware, the law as it at present stood with regard to the procedure as to Patents was contained in the Patent Law Amendment Act of 1852 and some Acts which had been passed since to amend it. No doubt those statutes placed the law on a much better footing than it was before, but many defects in the working of the system had since been discovered, and until those defects were removed it could not be said that the Patent Laws of this country were satisfactory. He would point out what appeared to him to be the most striking of those defects, and would explain as he went along how it was intended by the Government to remedy them. The first objection he had to make to the working of the present system had reference to specifications. It was almost, if not absolutely, the universal practice to file in the first instance a provisional specification, and thereupon to receive provisional protection, as it was called. The period of protection was six months, and during that time the provisional specification was kept secret. Before that period elapsed application had to be made for Letters Patent, and they were usually granted, unless successfully opposed, on condition that the inventor should within a certain time file a further specification, which was called the complete specification, describing accurately and distinctly the nature of his invention, and the mode in which it was to be carried into effect. Now, that was, he thought, a bad system, because, in the first place, those who were interested in opposing the grant of the Letters Patent had to do so in the dark, having really no opportunity afforded them of ascertaining exactly what it was the applicant wanted to patent. All they knew was that certain advertisements had appeared describing generally the sort of thing for which provisional protection had been obtained. There was another disadvantage: From the moment the applicant received the Letters Patent, being sealed he was armed with the means of bringing actions for infringements of the Patent; in fact, he was armed with the means to a very great extent of levying black mail, because, although his contrivance might be as old as the hills, and although his Letters Patent might be, for a number of reasons, perfectly bad, and although anybody who should be bold enough to meet him in a Court of Law would have an easy victory, yet most people had an objection, not, perhaps, altogether unreasonable, to embark in law suits, and rather than encounter an action for damages for an infringement of the Patent it often happened that they preferred to pay royalties for the use of the contrivance. It seemed to him, then, that the true policy would be not at once to give Letters Patent to a man, trusting him to disclose its nature afterwards, but to give ample notice to the parties interested that they might be enabled to show, if they could, that the Patent ought not to be granted. There were other reasons which he would not at present go into for objecting to the existing system. In order to remedy this state of things it was proposed that when the applicant filed his provisional specification, as allowed at present, there should be an examination for the purpose of ascertaining whether it properly described the contrivance, and whether the contrivance was a fitting subject for a Patent, and it was further proposed to give him a longer period of protection—namely, a year, or, if necessary, more than a year, because many inventors, although they could describe their inventions in a general way, nevertheless required time to develop their ideas, and perhaps required the resources of third parties to aid them in experiments. During that period he thought it reasonable to provide that no action should be brought against any one for an infringement of the Patent, and before the period expired the applicant for Letters Patent would have to file a complete specification, which would be made public, submitted to examination, and then referred to the Law Officers and other authorities, and if either the applicants or the opponents were dissatisfied with the decision arrived at, an appeal would lie to the Lord Chancellor. Under this system it would be secured that before Letters Patent could be obtained a complete specification would be laid before the public, an opponent would not have to oppose in the dark, a patent would not be given for that which ought not to have a patent, and the petitioner and the inventor himself would in some respects be a great deal better off than before. The next, and a very striking defect in the present system was that there was no adequate examination of specifications. No doubt they were examined by the Law Officers, but they flowed in in great numbers—sometimes 100 a-week—and it was very difficult for those Officers to find the time to examine them, and even if the time were found, they had not the materials before them to enable them to make a complete examination. The want of examination operated as a hardship against the inventor himself, because he was, in consequence of the ease with which he obtained his specification, frequently lured on into expenditure which he could ill afford, to find when he had spent his money that the outlay had been perfectly useless. It was also a great detriment to the public that Letters Patent were given which ought not to be granted, for every Patent so granted had, he maintained, the effect of having an undue restraint on trade. That state of things he proposed to obviate, and for the future the complete specification was to be subject to examination by a body of examiners which would be created by the Bill for the first time, for the purpose of ascertaining whether it was in proper form and whether the invention was a subject-matter for a Patent. The examiners would further have the important power of reporting whether or not in their opinion the specification disclosed a contrivance which was novel. That was a provision which would, he thought, be productive of great benefit, because no one could doubt that above one-half these contrivances were not novelties. When the examination had been concluded by the examiners they would report, and the specifications would then be made public and the matter would be referred to the Law Officers of the Crown, whose duty it would be to decide whether, under the circumstances, Letters Patent should be granted or not. As the law at present stood, the decision of the Law Officers if against a Patent was final, and that, he supposed, was one reason why they sometimes passed Patents which they ought not. He proposed, however, to give an appeal from the Law Officers' decision by the Bill, both to the applicant and to the opponents. But there was another defect in the law as it stood, and that was that there was no means of compelling a Patentee to put his contrivance into use. A Patentee, for example, who had invented some improvement in the manufacture of steel might practically monopolize the whole business, though the means at his disposal might be utterly inadequate to enable him to supply the public wants. In order to remove that defect, it was proposed that for the future if a man failed to put into use the invention for which he had obtained his Patent, say, for three, or, rather, four years, it should be competent for the Lord Chancellor if he found that Patentee had so acted without reasonable excuse to revoke the Patent and to grant licences to manufacture on such terms as might be deemed just, the Patent to be revoked if the Patentee refused to comply with the decision of the Lord Chancellor. That, he thought, would effect a very great improvement in the existing law, while the inventor could scarcely complain of such a provision as being unfair, because no man had any property by our law in his invention unless he obtained Letters Patent. As a reward of his ingenuity he had a monopoly thus secured to him, but it was only right that it should be subject to reasonable conditions. The next point of importance which occurred to him was the peculiar position in which a Patentee now stood with respect to the rights of the Crown, a position which was considered somewhat hard. Under the existing law Her Majesty was entitled to make use of a man's Patent in her workshops to any extent which the Government might think proper without paying a single halfpenny. It had, however, been recently decided that if the Crown engaged with a contractor who agreed to supply articles, in manufacturing which a Patent might be used, although the agreement was to supply the Crown with those articles, and nobody else, still the contract or would be subject to the payment of a royalty to the Patentee. It was, however, obvious that that liability might be got over by resorting to a very easy contrivance, for the Government, if they thought fit to do so, though he did not say they would, might make the contractor the servant of the Crown and his workmen the workmen of the Crown, and in that way deprive the unfortunate man of all remuneration. Now, that was a state of things which he did not think fair, and it was deemed far better that the Crown should have the most unlimited right to use a patented article, but that it should pay for the exercise of that right, and if the amount to be paid could not be settled by agreement between the parties, that it should then be settled by the Treasury or some other tribunal appointed for the purpose. Again, as the law stood it enabled a man to patent what was called a communication from abroad. He himself, for instance, might go to Belgium and be struck with some ingenious contrivance for winding up blinds, for which he might on his return to England obtain a Patent, although he had no merit in the invention, and could purchase the right to it abroad for a few guineas. That he did not regard as a proper state of things, and that in justice it was proposed to remove. He therefore proposed that no Patent for a communication from abroad was to be allowed, although every facility would still be given to those foreign inventors to have their inventions patented whom it was desirable to attract to this country. There was another very important point to which he wished to refer. At present Patents were granted for 14 years subject to certain conditions, but Her Majesty, through her Privy Council, had a right to prolong a Patent if she thought proper, and some rules had been laid down on the subject with respect to the usefulness of the Patent and the remuneration of the Patentee for his ingenuity and labour. It was, however, very difficult to apply those rules, especially to those cases in which a Patent right had been sold, and the Government had deemed it desirable that the right to apply for a prolongation should be done away with, and that instead a Patent should be granted from the outset for 21 years. This would be a great boon to the Patentee. There was also a provision in the Bill that a Patent should cease if it were not renewed at the end of the 3rd, the 7th, and the 14th year. At present it was necessary for a Patentee who desired a renewal to produce the Letters Patent themselves, but this difficulty would in future disappear, as he would only be required to produce the certificate described in the Bill. There were at present no means if a Patent had been accidentally allowed to expire to make an application afterwards for its renewal, but under a provision in this Bill the Lord Chancellor would be empowered to grant an additional period for applying for the renewal of a Patent. The Government also thought that the expense in the earlier stages of obtaining Letters Patent was too heavy and pressed with undue severity on the poorer class of Patentees, from whom inventions to a great extent proceeded. Therefore it was proposed to diminish by one-half the expense of obtaining a Patent. At present the expense up to the complete specification was £25, and it was intended to reduce it to £12 10s.

The Attorney General

Mr. SAMUDA, interposing, remarked that £25 was not the expense for the United Kingdom.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, that, whatever the expense might actually be, it would be lessened by one-half. It was not proposed, however, that the duties payable at the end of the 3rd and 7th years should be diminished. Perhaps those duties were somewhat heavy, and operated rather hardly sometimes on the poorer Patentees; but it was highly important to the community that worthless Patents should be weeded out, and there was no more effectual mode of doing this than by making it obligatory on the Patentee at the end of a particular time to pay something like a substantial duty. As a rule the worth of a Patent could be ascertained in four years, and it was not unreasonable to enact that, prior to its renewal, something like a substantial duty should be paid. At the end of seven years, at all events, one would think that the advantages of a Patent would have exhibited themselves. If, however, a Patent turned out to be worthless, the Patentee would not pay the duty. It was proposed to impose an additional duty for the renewal of a Patent so as to give the Patentee a right to the 21 years, and it was thought that it would be better that this additional duty of £100 should be payable at the end, not of 14, but of 12 years, so that the public might be fully aware whether the Patentee intended to make an application for the extended time.

Mr. MUNDELLA inquired whether duties would have to be paid at the end of the 3rd and 7th years, as at present?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL replied in the affirmative, and went on to say that the present Commissioners were the Lord Chancellor, the Master of the Rolls, and the two Law Officers for England. It was proposed, however, to increase their number by appointing as Commissioners the Law Officers for Scotland and Ireland, and some gentlemen who were not lawyers, but who were conversant with manufactures, trade, and inventions. He had now described all the main provisions of the Bill, though he had not dwelt on many minor points such as the power conferred on a Court of Law when dealing with a Patent case to call in scientific assessors. [Mr. MUNDELLA: Are the Commissioners to be paid?] The examiners would be paid, but the Commissioners would receive no salaries. Some of them, indeed, would not condescend to be paid, and if some were paid and others not paid, he did not think they would act together very harmoniously. Their duties would not be onerous, but they would have the general superintendence of the working of the system, and he did not think it necessary that they should be paid. These were the main provisions of the Bill, and in his opinion it would be beneficial to inventors, to manufacturers, and to trade generally; and, therefore, he moved the House that leave be given him to bring it in.

MR. DILLWYN said, he did not approve of some of the provisions of the Bill; but there was much in it of which he approved. He hoped to see the Patent Laws so amended as to prove advantageous to the inventor and the country; and he was glad that the present measure was introduced in the House of Commons, instead of in "another place." He hoped they would have a full discussion upon it. As, however, he understood the hon. and learned Attorney General's statement, he apprehended that the measure, without very considerable alteration, would not work well, and that its operation in its present form in a few years would tend to destroy the Patent Laws, and to render them perfectly useless. It would have a most discouraging effect, in his opinion, upon the class of poorer inventors. There were many inventions which had been pooh-poohed by the authorities and by the public for years which had subsequently turned out to be of the greatest value, and he entirely demurred to allowing any set of examiners to decide whether an invention was likely to be useful; that must be entirely a matter of opinion. He was sorry, too, that the hon. and learned Attorney General had not proposed to pay the Commissioners of whom he had spoken. The break-down of the present law—and there could be no doubt that it had broken down to a certain extent—was due to the fact that the work had been referred to gentlemen who could not possibly attend to it. In order to that work being properly done, he believed it was necessary that they should have able and first-class Commissioners, who should be properly paid. The existing law, if he remembered rightly, provided that the Commissioners should be the Lord Chancellor, the Master of the Rolls, the Law Officers of the Crown, and certain other persons to be appointed. These were the Gentlemen who were supposed to attend to the work; but no such persons had ever been appointed, and the consequence had been that it had been referred to subordinates—a result which was not, in his opinion, desirable.

MR. MUNDELLA said, in common with the hon. Member for Swansea (Mr. Dillwyn) he also rejoiced that the Bill which had formed the subject of the speech of the hon. and learned Attorney General had been introduced into the House of Commons. In that House there was a practical knowledge of invention, and the industry of the country was much more likely to be properly looked after than could be the case in "another place." In addition to that he was bound to say, after an experience of the way in which the question had been discussed on two occasions in "another place," that a most dangerous theory had been prevalent in that "place," and that Bills had been permitted to pass there which, if they had been allowed to pass the House of Commons also, and come into practical operation, would have proved ruinous to those who were affected by them, and he regarded the present Bill as a great improvement on those measures. The question was one of the utmost practical importance, and if they approached it with a determination to do what was just and right they would easily arrive at a satisfactory solution of the difficulty. Happily, it was not one of Party, and both Parties would be anxious to make the measure—the details of which would require very serious consideration—as perfect as possible. The object of such legislation ought to be to promote, encourage, and give facilities for inventions, and if that were done in this case, the Bill, in its working, could not fail to be attended with the best results. He trusted that every unnecessary difficulty which stood in the way of the inventor would be removed, and while he was glad to hear that some modifications upon previous proposals had been introduced into the present Bill, especially as to the time and provisional specifications, he thought there were provisions in it which would have the effect of reducing the number of Patents to a minimum; and that was a result which was not for one moment desirable. The hon. and learned Attorney General had said he believed the more Patents were sifted the fewer they would become; but, in opposition to that view, he (Mr. Mundella) might point to the case of the United States, where the number taken out was 300 or 400 per cent in excess of England. There was no country where Patents were so closely sifted as in America; and there was no country where there were so many, and where invention had done so much towards saving human labour, or had been more appreciated. In Washington they had a splendid museum for their Patents, while in London we had a few wretched sheds in the Kensington Museum, where discoveries of men like Arkwright and Stephenson were placed. He hoped this would soon be remedied. In England he never saw an invention yet which was not pooh-poohed at first, and the inventor had so many difficulties to contend with and was always so unpopular that the Government should try rather to smooth his path than to put any obstacles in his way. As to the Lord Chancellor fixing what should be the licence for working any particular Patent, or as to examiners with his Lordship's assistance doing so, he thought it was an utter impossibility. The hon. and learned Attorney General had said that under the present system Patentees had an opportunity of levying black mail upon their co-manufacturers; but he (Mr. Mundella), for one, had never known a Patentee of whom that could be truly said. On the other hand, a Patentee had to run the risk of his rich competitors coming down upon him with their wealth and crushing him; and as in this country the great mass of inventors were poor inventors, in legislating on this matter, provisions should be enacted which would have the effect of encouraging them, for the House should remember that the inventions which had most revolutionized trade were the works of poor men. He was quite clear that in the clause which gave the Lord Chancellor the right to grant compulsory licences lay the whole of the mischief in the Bill. A poor man might bring out the best invention in the world, and a rich manufacturer, saying that he did not want the machine to prosper, for it would cost him say £70,000, and render his then existing plant useless, might get a compulsory licence, ruin the inventor, and put the invention aside. He did not believe that a bad Patent would injure an industry, because it would not be adopted. If an inventor brought out a bad Patent he simply paid his duty to Her Majesty and lost his money. He approved of the provision with regard to foreign inventors, and hoped the Government would adopt an international system of Patents in the same way as the international system of trade marks, and he could see no difficulty in this. With regard to the expense, the proposition was to lessen the smallest and increase the largest part of the expense. A Patent in France for 13 years could be had for £20 odd, and in America for 15 years for under £20, and he could see no reason why so large a sum as £50 was demanded under this Bill. The hon. and learned Attorney General said that a man could afford to pay £50 after three years' enjoyment of his Patent, but this was the most difficult payment he could be called upon to make, because he was seldom able by that time to get his article introduced into the market. The tendency of this provision must, therefore, be to discourage Patents. Patents ought to be obtained in this country as cheaply as in France or Belgium, and, in his opinion, it would be better to make the first payment for a Patent £1, and afterwards an annual payment of £1 or £2 during its existence. A much larger sum would thereby be obtained from the inventors, and the country much more benefited in its industry. It was unwise to discuss a Bill on its introduction, because he had learned from experience that it was impossible to trust to the details of a Bill from any Minister who introduced it. This, he would repeat, was no Party question, and he sincerely trusted that both sides of the House would co-operate in making it a measure that would be for the best interests of the Patentee and for the interests of the country.

SIR GEORGE BOWYER said, he had no doubt the Bill would be very useful, but he wished to say a few words with regard to two points in it, which he regarded with dislike—first, on the Patent itself, and next as to the examiners. The Patent was an antiquated thing altogether and in itself meant expense. It was made out on a large piece of parchment with the Royal seal, and was a remnant of the old theory that the issue of a Patent was part of the Royal Prerogative. Instead of coming from the Lord Chancellor, a Patent should proceed from the Board of Trade. Why should not a Patent be like the brevet d'invention, as in France, or a certificate as in Belgium, which would be equally effective; and he considered that the privileges of inventors should be made as cheap as possible. The certificate should be issued from the Board of Trade which had the proper machinery to consider these questions, and it should specify the number of years for which the inventor should enjoy the privileges of his invention. With regard to the examiners, he could not see why a Patent should receive any consideration or undergo any examination before it was issued. If a Patent was found to be good, the inventor had his reward; if, on the other hand, it was useless, he hurt no one. When a man climbed up to the top of St. Paul's and stood upon the highest part of it on one leg, he applied to George III. for a reward. The King said he would give him a Patent. That would not have injured any one else, because no one wanted to perform the same feat. The principle in granting Patents ought to be one of great freedom, and it was for the public good that inventors should be able to take out Letters Patent at the smallest expense. All he thought necessary was a fee sufficient to pay office expenses and no more.

MR. B. SAMUELSON said, he was glad to see that the Bill followed the lines of the recommendations of the Committee on the question of Patents which sat in 1871 and 1872. The differences between the Bill about to be introduced and those which had been introduced during the last two Sessions in "another place" had been so clearly stated by the hon. and learned Attorney General, that they were in a better position to judge of its merits than they generally were on the first reading of a Bill. He believed it was in many respects a better Bill than those to which he had adverted. He gave it his cordial support, and could only express the hope that it would not meet with the same fate as those of 1875 and 1876, for if such should be the case he would rather that the Government should have availed themselves of those powers which they already possessed by the Bill of 1852 which had never yet been put in operation. He trusted that Commissioners would at length be appointed. The present Commissioners were as useless as if they were non-existent, because with their multifarious occupations they could not give any attention to the administration of the Patent Laws. He agreed with the hon. and learned Attorney General that there were difficulties and objections to the appointment of paid Commissioners, because there were eminent men whose services could be secured, but who would feel that the acceptance of salaries called for greater sacrifices than they were prepared to make. Not to mention any one living, he would instance the late Sir William Fairbairn as a specialist who would probably have given valuable service as an honorary Commissioner. With good officers the general superintendence of the office might be left to unpaid Commissioners. He thought there had been several mistakes regarding the functions of the examiners, whose function would ascertain, not whether a so-called invention was frivolous, but whether it was properly the subject of a patent, and whether it was a novelty, and on this point examination would be of the greatest service, not only to the public, but to inventors also. As a manufacturer of machinery and of iron, he could adduce many instances of Patents which were mere obstructions to the development of improved processes of manufacture. For this reason he rejoiced at the introduction of compulsory licensing, which he hoped nothing would induce the Attorney General to abandon. If the Patent system were to be maintained, it was necessary that inventions should not continue to be monopolies in this sense. Before the Committee of 1871-2, it came out that there were inventions patented by Englishmen, and yet the articles manufactured under the patents were manufactured exclusively and imported from abroad. Was that a state of things that ought to be allowed to continue? Nine out of ten of the Patents for sewing machines were worked entirely by the importation from abroad of the manufactured article.

and that was an argument for compulsory licensing. There was keen international competition in sugar refining, and a simple improvement patented in this country might render all our manufacturers except the Patentee unable to compete with those of Holland, where there were no Patents. With regard to the question who should decide what the value of a licence was to be, he believed that in very nearly every case it would be determined by the giver and taker of the licence. It would be in rare cases only that the parties concerned would be unable to agree; the fact of an ultimate authority existing—the Patent Commissioners or the Lord Chancellor, would tend to induce them to come to an agreement. There was another provision he did not approve of—that as to the manner in which a Patentee was to be remunerated for his invention when it was used by the Crown. He did not think that the Treasury was sufficiently impartial. If the Commissioners of Patents or the Lord Chancellor were substituted then the provision would be of some service. The extension of time for the completion of specifications would in many cases be a boon; but inventions were often reduced to questions of detail and ran much on all fours with each other; and in such cases it would be a disadvantage to a rival inventor to be placed in a position of uncertainty for a long time. The advantages must be balanced against the disadvantages, and he was not prepared to say at that moment which were the weightier. It was only fair that a complete specification should be published before a Patent was granted, and it was a monstrosity that a monopoly should be given to a man without his being compelled to declare what the invention was, for some one might have been using it for years, and it was a hardship that he should be able to assert his right to continue its use only by costly litigation. Provisional specifications ought to state clearly what the inventions were, and care should be taken that the complete specification included nothing but what was fairly included in, or fairly grew out of, the provisional specification deposited. If there were a proper system of examination and of licensing, then the term of 21 years would be a fair concession. Under the present system, without the safeguard proposed by the hon. and learned Gentleman, an extension to 21 years would be unfair to the public. As to the question of a Patent Museum, the present Museum at South Kensington was a disgrace to the country, and no language could be too strong in deprecating its condition; what was really wanted was not a Museum of Patents, but of important scientific and manufacturing inventions. It was a mistake to suppose that all important inventions were patented. On the contrary, the patenting of an important invention was, in some trades, the exception, not the rule. This was especially the case in the manufacture of iron, and he could state that one of the causes which had led to the rapid development of the Cleveland Iron District was the liberality with which its manufacturers threw open their inventions to their neighbours, instead of each one attempting to secure a monopoly by taking out a Patent. As he had said, he would support the Bill of the hon. and learned Gentleman.

MR. ANDERSON said, he would admit the inconvenience of discussing a Bill on the first reading, but if the author of a Bill thought it necessary to make a speech in introducing it, he must expect to hear something in reply. As regarded inventors, there were two points he considered to be most urgently required—namely, a reduction of the expense of getting a Patent, and the extension of time to enable an inventor to reap the reward of his discovery. On the first point he did not think the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General had made out his case in favour of his Bill. In America the expense he believed was only $35, or £7, and he (Mr. Anderson) thought the mode of examination adopted there was much better than ours, and the proof of that was in the result, for in no country was the inventive genius of the people so stimulated to activity as there, and if we wished really to encourage the inventive genius of our people, we ought, as far as possible, to adopt the system in vogue in America. On the second point, he thought the extension of time to 21 years would give the utmost satisfaction to inventors. He objected, however, to that portion of the Bill which required that an inventor should divulge everything before he got his Patent, while it was left to the examiner to say whether the Patent should be granted. What man in the possession of a secret which he deemed of great value would risk its loss by accepting such terms? It could not be expected that a man would divulge his invention to the whole world while there was so much uncertainty whether he would get a Patent or not. As to licences, the public were entitled to some protection in the matter, for they had a right to demand that they should be enabled to get the fair use of a Patent. He thought that if the Commissioners were not paid the work would not be done well. He had no great belief in unpaid work. They must pay for work either in money or honour. Members of Parliament were paid in honour, but would these Commissioners be sufficiently paid in honour? He considered that it would be better to pay those gentlemen for doing the work than to pay the Law Officers of the Crown, for he could not see why the latter should be paid at all for this work; and now it was proposed to bring the Law Officers of Scotland and Ireland into the same system. They should pay the Commissioners and reduce the charges to those ingenious men who made new discoveries.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, he would not reply to the objections which had been stated to the Bill; they would be better discussed hereafter. He wished, however, to explain that he did not propose to allow the examiners a power of veto; they would only report, and they would not be able to report against a Patent on the ground that it was frivolous. Frivolous Patents would perhaps do no harm, except to the inventors themselves. The examiners would have only to report that the provisional specification, which would be kept secret, was properly framed, and when the specification was completed to see that it accorded with the provisional specification—whether it was properly framed, and whether it was novel or not. He did not know that the American system was the best, nor that it could be copied with advantage, for he could not conceive that in any country there could be 18,000 new inventions in any one year.

Motion agreed to.

Bill for consolidating, with Amendments, the Acts relating to Letters Patent for Inventions, ordered to be brought in by Mr. ATTORNEY GENERAL, The LORD ADVOCATE, and Mr. SOLICITOR GENERAL for IRELAND.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 64.]

ROADS AND BRIDGES (SCOTLAND) BILL.

LEAVE. FIRST READING.

THE LORD ADVOCATE: I rise to ask leave of the House to bring in a Bill to alter and amend the Law in regard to the management and maintenance of Roads and Bridges in Scotland, and I will endeavour to indicate to the House, very briefly I trust, the circumstances under which the Bill is introduced, and the objects which it is thereby proposed to attain. Hon. Members of this House are probably aware that in Scotland there is no obligation at Common Law either to make or to maintain roads and bridges. Those obligations arise entirely from the statute law of the land. Our roads in Scotland, or public highways, are of two characters. There are statute-labour roads, which were originally intended simply for purposes of local communication, were originally maintained by the personal services of dwellers in each particular parish, and are now maintained in most cases by what is called commutation money—that is, by a parish rate levied within the bounds of the parish in lieu of the personal service formerly given. The second class of roads are called turnpike roads, and they are managed by trustees constituted by a long series of local statutes. As a general rule these roads constitute, or did constitute at one time, the main trunk lines of communication through the country, and serve for the purposes of what is called through traffic. As an invariable rule these turnpike roads have been maintained, not by assessment, but by a levy of toll from persons using the roads. Of late years the spread of railway communication throughout Scotland has altered very much the character of the traffic upon these roads. It no longer represents through traffic, because of late all such traffic passes either by water or by rail, and the result is that these main lines of road, originally formed and maintained for other purposes, have virtually become part of our local system, and are used as such almost exclusively. It is proposed by the present Bill to combine the management of our statute-labour and our turnpike roads, to abolish entirely the system of levying tolls, and to throw the maintenance of both classes of roads for the future upon a rate levied from lands and heritages throughout the whole of Scotland. It is proposed to give the administration of the whole of the roads, statute-labour and turnpike, within the county to the county, and to give the management and administration of all roads and streets within burghs in Scotland to the burgh authorities, meaning thereby the town council or the police commissioners of the burgh. It is right to inform the House that this Bill does not directly affect the whole of the counties in Scotland. It is right that the House should know that out of the 32 counties in Scotland, 14 have already obtained local Acts from the Legislature from time to time, under which tolls have been abolished, and roads of every class are maintained by rates upon lands and heritages. Two other counties have obtained local Acts, whereby the maintenance of the roads will be thrown upon rating as soon as the debt of the turnpike trusts has been paid off by means of tolls. Other two counties, Dumfriesshire and Forfarshire, have recently obtained local Acts in virtue of which they have power at any time to abolish tolls. In Dumfriesshire that has already been carried out to a great extent, although no steps have been taken, I am informed, in Forfarshire for the purpose. So there only remain 14 counties in Scotland in which turnpike roads are still exclusively maintained by the levy of tolls. In none of the cases I have referred to where tolls are still levied is there any right to continue that levy in perpetuity. Several of the Turnpike Acts, by which turnpike trusts are constituted, contain within themselves provisions continuing them in force for periods which have not yet expired; but the great bulk of the Scotch local Acts constituting turnpike trusts, depend, and have for many years past depended, for their existence on the passing through the Legislature from time to time of general Acts—the Turnpike Trusts Continuance Acts—and I find that in regard to those 14 counties which I have mentioned, in which tolls are still levied, and the turnpike roads thereby maintained, that all the Acts constituting those trusts, with a few exceptions, will expire in the year

1878, and all the trusts continued by the Turnpike Trusts Continuance Act of 1876 will expire with the close of the Session of Parliament in 1878. There would only then remain existing, were those Acts not renewed by a Continuation Act, the Ayrshire Turnpike Trust Act, which expires in 1879; three out of 11 turnpike Acts for Roxburghshire, two of them expiring in 1881 and one in 1892, and in the case of Lanarkshire, where there are no fewer than 21 separate statutes constituting separate trusts, only five would exist after 1878. Of those five, one would expire in 1879, one in 1880, one in 1881, one in 1882, and the last in 1887. It is proposed by the Bill that its provisions may be adopted voluntarily by Commissioners of Supply, whether they have a local statute or not, at any time within the next 10 years; but that at the end of 10 years it shall become a compulsory measure in all those counties where at that date the exaction of tolls or statute-labour money has not been abolished either under local Acts, or by the county having voluntarily adopted the provisions of the Bill. It appears to the framers of the Bill that that would give sufficient time for those counties in which there are exceptional difficulties with regard to the abolition of tolls or the adjustment of areas and burdens as between county and burgh, to overcome these difficulties, either by means of the machinery provided in Section 8 of the Bill, or by arrangement. When it is adopted, the provisions of the Bill are that the management should be vested, first, in a body of County Road Trustees, to consist of Commissioners of Supply of the county, in whom the control of our roads of whatever class is at present vested, with the addition to that body of the nominee of any corporation holding land of the value of £800 and upwards on the valuation roll, and the further addition of an elective member, elected by the rate-payers, one for each parish within the county. As this body would be rather unwieldy for the constant administration of the trusts throughout the year, it is proposed that the plan adopted should be similar to that which has been followed with success in some of those local statutes—letting the County Road Trustees appoint a County Road Board, consisting of 30 members, with a certain proportion of elected members among them. Further, an important part of the administration of the local management of the roads will be entrusted to district committees. In the case of burghs the administration may be much more simply provided for; and here I ought to explain that by the word "burgh" in the sense in which I have used it, I mean, in the first place, Royal burghs; in the second place, Parliamentary burghs; and, in the third place, populous places of considerable size and extent which have adopted the provisions of the General Police Act. The limit fixed in the Bill is a population of 10,000, and it is obvious that a burgh of that extent may have an interest separate from the county, and roads and streets within it sufficient to form the subject of a separate local administration. Then, there being a separate administration for counties and for burghs, it is proposed that within burghs the streets and roads which are under the management of the local authority shall be as at present provided for in regard to maintenance, and new streets made and maintained out of rates levied on land and heritages in the burgh, one-half in respect of ownership, and one-half in respect of occupancy. Within the county a different rule is to obtain. There are three things to be provided for in both burgh and county alike. In the first place, the maintenance of roads; in the second place, the making of new roads or bridges; and, in the third place, provision must be made for the debt which attaches to roads already formed. It is proposed that within counties, in order to maintain the roads, an assessment shall be levied, one-half on owners and one-half on occupiers, but the provision made for the payment of debt and for new roads rests upon owners exclusively, and not upon those who temporarily occupy land, with this further provision, that in all questions relating to the formation of new roads no trustee shall have a vote imposing an assessment who is not himself an owner of land, so that it will be left to proprietors to decide whether their interests will be so advanced by it as to justify them in incurring the outlay. It is further proposed by the Bill that debts upon roads shall be taken over at their true value. The Bill also contains other provisions of considerable importance for making a fair allocation of the debt in the first place, as between county and county, because these turnpike trusts are not, like statute-labour roads, localized. There will also be an allocation as between county and burgh. As regards the debts on existing roads, there is no liability whatever incumbent upon the trustees except what may be met out of the tolls. In some instances these are amply sufficient to meet the interest, and in time liquidate the capital; but, in very many other cases, the tolls are not sufficient to pay the interest on the capital. With respect to these it is proposed that they shall be bought up at the fair market price. When a road serves the purposes of two adjoining counties, the debt will be fairly allocated between them, and under like conditions between the county and the burgh. Then, again, several of the bridges in Scotland are in an exceptional position. A bridge may be in a borough; but it may be equally useful to the county, as it may connect two parts of the same county or two districts, and therefore, in such cases they will be exceptionally dealt with, so as to apportion the cost of maintenance fairly between the counties, or the county and burgh, which are benefited by them without imposing the sole burden upon the county or burgh in which they may happen to be situated. Perhaps I may be permitted, in conclusion, to express a hope that, as this question of roads has deeply interested the people of Scotland, this Bill, which I ask leave to lay on the Table, may be the means of enabling the Legislature to arrive at an expedient and safe solution of this much vexed question.

SIR EDWARD COLEBROOKE said, that he had a Bill of his own on this subject, but he was very glad that the Government had given the House so early an opportunity of discussing the question, which was thoroughly ripe for immediate legislation. He thought the Bill in its main provisions was the same as that which was brought before the House last Session. References had been made to the effects produced upon the road traffic of Scotland by the formation of railways, and there could be little doubt that this was practically the case, and what were formally looked upon as main lines had become used for local purposes only. He thought it was a question whether those who made the most use of the roads would, under the provisions of the Bill they had heard explained, contribute their fair share to the expenses. Some years ago he had advocated a plan, and this plan had received the support of many authorities on the subject. This plan was to adopt a uniform management, with a uniform scheme of tolls. He explained that such a plan, if carried out, would tend to lighten the burden on the shoulders of those who had to bear it, and not lay it on the shoulders of others in an unfair way. He trusted that his suggestion would be considered by the Government, and that the result would be a more efficient management than the one at present in existence.

MR. J. W. BARCLAY said, the Government deserved thanks for introducing this Bill at so early a period of the Session, and he looked upon it as an intimation of the earnestness and desire of the Government to carry the measure this year. He agreed with the principles laid down by the learned Lord Advocate, but he regretted that the Government had gone back with respect to the period of final application. It was proposed last year that the option should not extend to more than five years, but, according to the Bill, 10 years might elapse before the total abolition of tolls in Scotland. Now, he thought that there were certain inconveniences attending such deferred legislation. If the owners of the roads or the trustees interested chose to do so, they might adopt the policy of starving the roads with a view to increase the interest on their debt; and when the time arrived for handing over the roads, they might be found out of repair. This would of course throw a heavy burden on the new trustees, in order to put them in proper condition. In his constituency the Commutation Road Trustees had allowed a large proportion of the roads to become entirely worn out, and consequently the cost of repairing them had fallen very heavily upon the owners and occupiers. He apprehended that under the system proposed by the Lord Advocate the roads which would be affected by it would also become worn out before they were handed over to the new authorities. He trusted, therefore, that the Government, if they kept to the period of 10 years, would insert in their Bill a provision requiring the old trustees to hand over the roads in a fair condition of repair to the new trustees. It was unfortunate that the power of adopting the Bill would be placed in the hands of a body which was hostile to the new system, and of whose opinions the hon. Baronet who had just spoken (Sir Edward Colebrooke) might be taken as a representative. He might remind the House that no one had benefited so much previously by the formation of roads and railways as the owners of the land in their neighbourhood, and, therefore, it was very selfish of them to object to pay their fair proportion of the expense of keeping them in repair. He trusted that the Bill would become law during the present Session, and would give it his earnest support.

COLONEL ALEXANDER expressed a hope that the Government would assure the House that sufficient time would be given between all the stages of the Bill, so that all persons interested would be able to give the measure full consideration. He quite saw that, owing to the short period there was to elapse before the expiration of the different trusts, the learned Lord Advocate was obliged to introduce the Bill that evening; but he would point out that the Act for the county of Ayr expired not in 1879, but in 1878. It should be borne in mind that 14 counties would be affected by the Bill, and that the circumstances of those counties differed very materially. Some of them were what might be called mineral counties, while others were devoted almost wholly to agriculture. The county which he had the honour to represent was partly mineral and partly agricultural; and he might say that the agricultural country roads were some of the best in Scotland.

MR. RAMSAY approved of the general principle of the Bill for the abolition of tolls, and hoped that all the bodies in Scotland who were interested in the measure, and competent to form a judgment upon it, would have sufficient time allowed them to consider its provisions before it was set down for a second reading. The Bill contained numerous details of great importance to mineral owners, land owners, and others, and there were many districts in Scotland which had peculiarities in comparison with other districts, and which had Acts of their own so framed as to meet local wants, and these circumstances gave rise to a considerable diversity on local requirements. That was an important fact to remember in the case of a Bill which, if it passed into law, was to be made compulsory at the expiration of a period of 10 years.

THE LORD ADVOCATE, in reply, admitted that Lanarkshire, like Ayrshire, stood in an exceptional position; and as to the separation of the burghs and counties, he pointed out that the separation, unless attended by a provisional order or by agreement, would take effect either at the municipal or the Parliamentary boundary of the burgh.

Motion agreed to.

Bill to alter and amend the Law in regard to the maintenance and management of Roads and Bridges in Scotland, ordered to be brought in by THE LORD ADVOCATE and Mr. Secretary CROSS.

SUPREME COURT OF JUDICATURE (IRELAND) BILL.

LEAVE. FIRST READING.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. PLUNKET) in moving for leave to bring in a Bill for the constitution of a Supreme Court of Judicature and for other purposes relating to the better administration of Justice, in Ireland, said, it differed in a few particulars from the Bill which last year obtained a second reading in that House. As far as the general objects of this Bill were concerned—namely, the application to Ireland of those great reforms in the system of Judicature which had been introduced in England—this Bill was, in the main, the same as that of last year. The chief point on which it differed was that, while effecting a reduction in the judicial strength of the Courts of Common Pleas and Exchequer, it proposed that the Judge of the Probate Court should retain his present position, that branch of business being of so much importance as to demand the whole time and attention of a Judge. The Bankruptcy Court would also remain as it was at present, and provision was made that when a vacancy occurred in the Judgeship of the Admiralty Court the jurisdiction of that tribunal would be transferred to the Probate Division of the High Court of Justice. Another variation from the Bill of last Session was the omission of the clauses relating to the compulsory reference of cases to arbitration, which had been found to be exceedingly unpopular in Ireland. They had not been able to comply to the full extent with the desire expressed last year by some hon. Members by adding a complete Schedule of Rules and Orders; but they had introduced into the body of the Bill certain provisions which would, he believed, meet the substantial objection taken last Session to the absence of such a Schedule. He trusted that the present measure would be more fortunate than the one of last year; and he was sure that in the interests of the Bench, the Bar, and the public, the House would do well to put an end, as soon as practicable, to the protracted uncertainty which had prevailed in regard to the carrying out in Ireland of the great reforms in the Judicature of the country which had already been adopted in England. He therefore now moved for leave to bring in the Bill.

MR. MELDON said, he did not intend to enter into any discussion on the Bill; but, at the same time, he must congratulate the Solicitor General on the improvement which the measure had undergone since last year. Every alteration in the Bill was an improvement, and this might be said especially of the proposition to leave the administration of Bankruptcy as it was before. It was clear that the modifications in the Bill had been introduced by some one well acquainted with the difference in the circumstances of England and Ireland.

Motion agreed to.

Bill for the constitution of a Supreme Court of Judicature, and for other purposes relating to the better administration of Justice, in Ireland, ordered to be brought in by Mr. SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND and Sir MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 66.]

COUNTY OFFICERS AND COURTS (IRELAND) BILL.

LEAVE. FIRST READING.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. PLUNKET) in moving for leave to bring in a Bill to amend the laws relating to County Officers and to the Courts of Quarter Sessions and Civil Bill Courts in Ireland, said, though it was not an exact counterpart of any Bill of last Session, it was, in point of fact, a combination of two of those Bills, the Clerks of the Crown and Peace (Ireland) Bill, and the Civil Bill Courts (Ireland) Bill. In that part of the present Bill which referred to the County Courts, it was proposed to extend their jurisdiction mainly by giving them a jurisdiction in Equity, and to bring into immediate effect several other useful reforms in the local administration of justice. It was divided into four parts. Its first object was to consolidate the offices of Clerk of the Crown and Clerk of the Peace, and at the same time to provide an efficient Registrar for the County Courts. The clauses framed with this purpose were not very different from the proposals which were included in the Bill of last year; therefore he would not trouble the House by stating them. The principal objection taken last year was that in the office thus created efficiency had been too much sacrificed to economy. There were always some difficulties which occurred between those who proposed measures and those who had to find the sinews of war for carrying them out; but he was happy to say that on the present occasion he had been able to come to a better understanding with the Treasury than last year. A clause had been inserted in the Bill providing that, at any time after the passing of the Act, if it should appear that the staff was insufficient for carrying on the duties of the combined offices, the Lord Chancellor should have the power to order such additional assistance as he thought requisite, and there was also a provision in the Bill for payment to the officers so appointed. As to the second part of the Bill—that conferring an Equity jurisdiction—the Bill of last year provided for giving a jurisdiction in Equity in matters in which the annual value of the property did not exceed £30. In the present Bill that figure had been retained in regard to the annual value, but £300 had been substituted for £500 as the limit of jurisdiction in dealing with personal property. That limit had been fixed after consultation with several persons of high authority; but of course it was a proper subject of discussion in Committee. They proposed no alteration in regard to the limit of jurisdiction in testamentary cases, except in contentious cases, and in these the Bill proposed to increase the present limit of £200 to £300. As to the third part of the Bill

he need only say it was very much the same as the corresponding clause of the Civil Bill Courts Bill of last Session, extending the existing jurisdiction of the county Chairmen. Another important proposal was the reduction in the number of the Chairmen and Judges of the Civil Courts. There were at present 33 Chairmen of counties besides the Recorders, and the Bill proposed that there should be 21 Judges, including the three Recorders of Dublin, Belfast, and Cork, who would perform the combined offices of County Court Judge and Recorder. Instead, however, of retaining the present three classes of Chairmanships, the Bill contemplated but one class of Chairman, which, as to salary, should be equal to the present first-class Chairmanships. In the case of the Recorder of Dublin it was proposed when the arrangement combining the two offices of Recorder of the City and Chairman of the county of Dublin came into effect to pay him a salary of £2,500 a-year; in the case of the Recorder of Belfast of £2,000; and in the case of the Recorder of Cork also of £2,000 a-year. The Treasury was prepared to bear the whole expense and relieve the local taxation of the presentments for the Clerks of the Peace and Clerks of the Crown excepting those made for the registration of voters and jury lists. Special pensions would be paid to retiring Clerks of the Peace or Crown. There would be a revision of the fees in the Civil Bill Courts, and all the emoluments of those officers other than those to which he had referred would on the union of offices be paid into the Treasury. The hon. and learned Gentleman concluded by expressing confidence that this Bill would effect great improvement in the Civil Courts, which were already very valuable to Ireland, but could be rendered still more so when they acquired the equitable jurisdiction which this Bill would confer upon them. He believed that the consolidation of the offices of the Clerks of the Peace and of the Crown would also be attended with great public advantage. It was an old saying that the doors of the Courts of Equity were always open; but as the law now stood it was impossible for the Irish people to even approach the portals of the Court of Chancery, and he believed this Bill would be a great boon to his fellow-countrymen. He hoped that as it had been introduced at so early a period of the Session, Members on both sides would to their best to pass it.

MR. LAW congratulated his hon. and learned Friend on the early introduction of this measure. Of the expediency of giving the Irish Chairmen a substantial jurisdiction in Equity as well as an enlarged jurisdiction for Common Law actions and contentious testamentary matters, he did not think there could be any reasonable doubt; but the value of all this depended on whether the Chairman had an adequate staff of officers to assist him. As far as he could judge from the statement of his hon. and learned Friend, there was little, if any, improvement in this respect on the proposals of last Session, and he regretted to say that, in his opinion, the official assistance which the Government thus meant to provide for the Chairmen would be found wholly insufficient, and the measure consequently prove, he feared, an utter failure. This would be a very deplorable result for the establishment of efficient local tribunals to enforce or adjust the rights of the farmers and small traders throughout Ireland was urgently required, and had been too long delayed. There was one other point to which his hon. and learned Friend casually alluded at the close of his statement, and on which he (Mr. Law) desired to say a word. It appeared that the Bill proposed to prevent future Chairmen from practising at the Bar. Now to this he (Mr. Law) entirely objected, and that, not for the sake of the Chairmen to whom, indeed, it was a matter of indifference, but for the sake of the people, and to preserve their present confidence in the decisions of those local Courts, for it could hardly be doubted that the indirect effect of this provision would be to make the Chairmen quit Dublin and settle down with their families in the county or union of counties subject to their jurisdiction, and form at least intimacies, if not often closer connections, with the county families. Once this, or anything like this, was done, there would, he feared, be no longer that confidence on the part of the people which was at present felt in the decisions of the now non-resident Judges. However, he should take another opportunity of discussing this proposal. Meantime he gladly acknowledged that, notwithstanding these objections, the main object of the Bill was good; and he hoped that the Government would be able to carry it through this Session. It was, as he had said, a measure which was much wanted; and it would, he hoped, be of great benefit to Ireland.

SIR COLMAN O'LOGHLEN trusted that this important question, which so very materially affected the administration of justice in Ireland, would be fairly discussed, and that it might not come on until April, when barristers who were Members of that House and also members of the Irish Bar would be relieved from their legal engagements.

MR. M'CARTHY DOWNING concurred in the provision of the Bill which required that the Chairmen of Quarter Sessions should devote their entire time to the discharge of their duties.

MR. MURPHY hoped that a provision would be introduced into the Bill giving to the Chairmen of Quarter Sessions in Belfast and Cork a Bankruptcy jurisdiction.

MR. BIGGAR said, it had been suggested that the assistant barristers should go circuit, whereby the suspicion of partiality would be removed. He wished that Government had proposed to enlarge the jurisdiction of these Courts.

MR. MELDON objected to the introduction of local Bankruptcy Courts. The business was far better done in Dublin than in local Courts.

Motion agreed to.

Bill to amend the Laws relating to County Officers and to the Courts of Quarter Sessions and Civil Bill Courts in Ireland, ordered to be brought in by Mr. SOLICITOR GENERAL for IRELAND and Sir MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH.

LUNACY LAW.

MOTION FOR A SELECT COMMITTEE.

MR. DILLWYN, in moving that a Select Committee be appointed "to inquire into the operation of the Lunacy Law, so far as regards the security afforded by it against violations of personal liberty," said, there were two points in which the law especially required amendment—first, as to private patients sent to private asylums without any warrant from any public official, which seemed to him a violation of the Constitution; secondly, as regards the custody of such patients, the keeper of the asylum, that was the person most interested in keeping them, having the most potential voice in deciding whether they should be retained there. He believed that all private asylums ought to be gradually done away with.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS said, that it would have been inadvisable rashly to vote a Committee on this subject, as their proceedings would be read by persons subject to such derangements, to their possible excitement and injury. The noble Earl at the head of the Lunacy Commission (the Earl of Shaftesbury) was willing that the Committee should be granted. But he (Mr. Cross) would suggest that the powers of the Committee should be restricted, and sufficient safeguards might either be shown to exist or be provided. There was a strong feeling that such safeguards did not exist. Still, it was clear that early treatment was the best in the case of lunacy.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Tuesday, 13th February, 1876.

MINUTES.]—Sat First in Parliament—The Earl of Lonsdale, after the death of his Father.

SELECT COMMITTEE—Intemperance, nominated.

QUEEN'S SPEECH—HER MAJESTY'S
ANSWER TO THE ADDRESS.

THE LORD CHAMBERLAIN (the Marquess of HERTFORD) reported Her Majesty's Answer to the Address, as follows:—

MY LORDS,

I THANK you sincerely for your loyal and dutiful Address.

I rely with confidence on your earnest consideration of the measures which will be submitted to you, and I shall ever be ready to co-operate with you in your endeavours to promote the happiness and prosperity of all classes of My subjects.

NORTH AMERICA—EXTRADITION.
QUESTION.

EARL GRANVILLE: My Lords, I rise to put a Question to the noble Earl the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs with regard to the arrangements between this country and the United States as to the extradition of criminals. Your Lordships will remember that last year Her Majesty's Government refused to surrender on extradition processes two men, named Winslow and Brett, unless the Government of the United States gave a distinct pledge that the persons whose extradition was demanded should not be tried on any other charge than that in respect of which the extradition was granted. This was in consequence of a statement that a man named Lawrence, who had been already surrendered, was to be tried on a second charge. Since then one man has been surrendered—at least, it has been so stated, and I believe the statement to be true. I should, therefore, like to know, What were the conditions under which that surrender was made, whether any conditions were required, whether he was surrendered on such an assurance as had been given in the case of Winslow, but was not considered sufficient, or on a formal engagement that he should be tried for no other offence, such as required by the Home Secretary? But however it may have been brought about, if a satisfactory arrangement has been entered into, I rejoice sincerely at the conclusion of the affair, and I think both Governments deserve great credit for having, by a little common sense, extricated the two countries from what appears to me would have been little less than a public scandal.

THE EARL OF DERBY: My Lords, the noble Earl has put to me a Question which, although the Papers on the subject are ready for presentation—have, indeed, just been laid on the Table—it may still be convenient to your Lordships I should answer; it may also be desirable that I should explain in a few words the position in which this business actually stands. Your Lordships will remember how the matter stood last year. The extradition of a man named Lawrence was demanded by the American Government on a charge made against him. His extradition was granted on that charge, and he was put on his trial in the United States. While he was about to be put on his trial, a representation was made to us that steps were being taken by the United States Government to put him on trial for another offence, in the event of failure to obtain a conviction on the charge in respect of which his extradition had been granted.

Now, as the man had not been surrendered on that second charge, this representation raised the question as to the construction to be placed on the Extradition Treaty. We objected to the proceeding said to be contemplated by the United States Government; and that Government did not at the time deny the intention to put Lawrence on his trial in respect of the second charge; but they put forward views in reference to the construction of the Treaty which led to the Correspondence between the two Governments, which your Lordships will recollect, and ultimately to a discussion in this House. The result was that we and the Government of the United States held opposite views as to the construction of the Treaty, inasmuch as they claimed a right which we held they were not entitled to claim; and inasmuch as they asserted their intention to act on that claim, we felt bound to refuse to grant any further extraditions till the question should be settled. So matters remained for some time. Meanwhile, the man Lawrence was tried for the offence on which his extradition had been granted. I am not aware what became of him; but at all events there was no second trial. And in the month of August last we received, through the American Minister, a communication from the United States Government which, if it had been made before, would have saved a great deal of trouble and controversy. From this communication it appeared that, notwithstanding the representations which had been made to us on the subject, yet, as far as the United States Government were concerned, no steps had been taken, or had been intended to be taken, with the view of putting Lawrence on his trial for the second offence. In other words, the Government of the United States claimed a right under the Treaty which we did not admit the existence of; but they stated, and we did not doubt the accuracy of the statement, that they had not exercised, or attempted to exercise, the right they so claimed. That materially altered the position of affairs. We continued to maintain, and we maintain now, that the construction which we put on the Treaty was the correct one; but from the information we obtained in August, and which, I repeat, it is unfortunate that the United States Government did not think fit to supply at an earlier date, it appears that the question raised by the United States Government was purely theoretical. In other words, the point raised between the two Governments had not arisen in practice; and on becoming aware of that fact, we considered that the question might well remain in abeyance till it did so arise. We were of opinion that, in the circumstances actually existing, there was no further occasion for suspending the operation of the Treaty; the suspension has therefore ceased, and it remains now as it was before this controversy arose. Had steps been taken under it by the United States Government inconsistent with the view held by us, then we should have continued to hold that the Treaty could only be allowed to operate under the conditions suggested by us; but, as matters stand, we felt that those conditions were no longer required. The arrangement between the two Governments continue as before that question was raised, pending the negotiations for a new Treaty, which negotiations are now in progress. That is the whole case—and your Lordships will find the full details in the Papers now on the Table.

TURKEY—THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY'S EMBASSY—THE DESPATCH.

QUESTION. OBSERVATIONS.

EARL GRANVILLE: My Lords, I rise to ask another Question, of which I have given private Notice, and which is not likely to lead to debate. Having the other day expressed some alarm at the voluminous character of the Blue Book, it may appear inconsistent to ask for any addition to it—more especially as in some cases Her Majesty's Government has certainly given us very detailed information. For instance, in page 11, I find this despatch given at full length—

The Earl of Derby to the Marquis of Salisbury.

My Lord, Foreign Office, November 20, 1876.

I HAVE to request your Excellency to correspond with this office, while employed on the service of your Special Embassy, in a series of despatches, numbered and docketed, and addressed to Her Majesty's Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs.

(Signed) DERBY.

We all know that, in pursuance of these Instructions, Lord Salisbury did write despatches—and very good ones—and I have no doubt the first-rate Foreign Office clerks who accompanied him duly numbered and docketed them. With regard to this despatch, there is only one very small question which suggests itself to me. The Question is this. By the Blue Book the noble Marquess was clearly appointed "Special Ambassador." Why, then, in the Queen's Speech, does he suddenly tumble down to the more humble position of "Special Envoy?" But I do not require any answer to that Question—What I desire to know is, why the despatches recording Lord Salisbury's conversations with Prince Bismarck are not published, nor those with Marshal MacMahon and the Duc Decazes? Despatches are to be found in the Blue Book recording conversations with the Austrian Emperor, Count Andrassy, and Count Melagari:—there is also a conversation with the German Emperor; but I can find nothing as to those which are said to have taken place, and certainly did take place, between Lord Salisbury and Prince Bismarck and the French Government. The Emperor of Germany, among other things which he was stated to have said to the noble Marquess, stated that—

"He trusted that by the concession of reasonable reforms in the administration of the Turkish Provinces, combined with guarantees for their execution, the necessity for an occupation of Turkish territory might be avoided. His Majesty considered that it was impossible for Europe any longer to accept the mere promises of the Porte, and that it was indispensable that satisfactory guarantees against the continuance of the evils under which the Christians in Turkey were suffering should be arranged."

He (Earl Granville) thought there could be no doubt that Prince Bismarck held similar language to that of the Emperor, but the subject would probably have been further developed; and if it was important that the public should know the views of Italy and Austria, it was certainly not less important that they should know the views from Paris and Berlin. The Question he wished to put to the noble Earl was, whether the despatches he had alluded to were of so completely a confidential character that it would not be right to produce them? Any assurance to that effect from the noble Earl would be considered by him as sufficient.

THE EARL OF DERBY: My Lords, the noble Earl, in the intimation with which he closed his observations, has suggested by anticipation the answer which his diplomatic experience told him it would be my duty to give. Having regard to the confidential character of conversations sometimes held with foreign Ministers, cases must arise in which the Secretary of State and the Government have to consider whether the publication of those conversations would involve a breach of confidence, and whether it would be conducive to the public interests or calculated to produce embarrassment. In regard to the conversations held with the other eminent persons whom the noble Earl has named, we did not think that anything had passed the publication of which would be unsatisfactory to the persons concerned, or on public grounds in any way objectionable. But, as respects the conversations with the French Government and with Prince Bismarck, those were undoubtedly of a more unreserved and confidential character, and we thought that if we published them we should be doing that which would produce a very unpleasant feeling, and would be considered a breach of confidence. That is the reason why the despatches the subject of the noble Earl's Question have not been published with the other Papers.

RAILWAY ACCIDENTS—LEGISLATION.

QUESTION. OBSERVATIONS.

EARL DE LA WARR asked, Whether Her Majesty's Government proposed to bring forward any measure this Session on the subject of Railway Accidents? He very much regretted that circumstances should have delayed the Report of the Royal Commission on this subject; but it was now completed and in their Lordships' hands. Had the inquiry been brought earlier to a conclusion, their Lordships would have been able at the commencement of the Session to have given it consideration and perhaps discussion; but he thought it would not be unreasonable, looking to the public interest which was felt in the matter, if he asked for such information as would enable their Lordships and the public generally to know whether the Government would deal with the Question in the course of the present Session, and whether, at no distant period, the subject would be brought under the notice of Parliament?

THE EARL OF SANDWICH said, he should like to supplement the Question of the noble Earl who had just spoken, by asking whether the Board of Trade had power to compel the Railway Companies to adopt the recommendations which were made by the Government Inspectors from time to time in their Reports? Very serious accidents had lately happened on certain of our railways; and there could be no doubt that some of those accidents might have been prevented. Referring to a recent accident on the Great Northern Railway and a somewhat similar one that occurred about a year ago, the recommendations made by Captain Tyler as the result of his inquiries appeared to have been treated with contempt. In connection with this subject he thought it was a hardship that, when an accident did happen, and when information concerning it had reached the railway authorities at head-quarters, information of the fact that a casualty had occurred was not imparted to persons who intended travelling in the direction where the accident had taken place. The result of withholding the information which was thus known at head-quarters was that many persons often travelled on as if nothing had happened, only to be detained when they reached a certain point. With respect to the Report which had been referred to by the noble Earl (Earl De la Warr), that document was unquestionably an able one; but it was to be borne in mind that it was not a unanimous one. Of the nine Commissioners only six had signed it, and they were not agreed as to the measures to be adopted, two having drawn up Reports of their own. It would be very difficult, therefore, for any Government to act upon the Report of the Commission. There could be no doubt, however, that at the present time the number of trains which were run, at short intervals, constituted an element of danger; and it was worthy of consideration whether some measure bearing upon that point might not be brought before Parliament.

THE EARL OF BEACONSFIELD: My Lords, the Report of the Royal Commission is now in your Lordships' hands; but, as my noble Friend (the Earl of Sandwich) has just reminded us, that Report has not been presented to the Government with the authority of unanimity. There were nine Commissioners. Of the nine, the Chief Commissioner devoted, I believe, two years to the labours of the Commission; but he accepted an appointment in a distant part of the Empire, and was therefore unable to finish his task as a Royal Commissioner, and sign the Report. Another of the Commissioners, a distinguished Gentleman, a Member of the Privy Council, who has had considerable official experience, and who is a man of very business-like habits, has altogether declined to sign the Report; and my noble Friend, the noble Earl who introduced this conversation, has also refused to sign it; but he has done his duty to the public by furnishing, on his own account, a Report which is well worthy of consideration. My noble Friend (the Earl of Sandwich) has reminded us that six of the Royal Commissioners did sign the Report; but, strange to say, two of these appear to have signed it only out of courtesy—through a feeling of good fellowship with, and as a compliment to, the remaining Commissioners, with whom, however, they did not agree. They also have furnished Reports of their own, which Reports are of an elaborate character—one of them extending to 25 folio pages. Under these circumstances, your Lordships will see that, as regards the Report of the Royal Commission, it is one which the Government must examine with a great deal of critical examination, and it must be equally obvious that, whether the Report is signed by the majority of the Commissioners or not, the Government cannot come to any conclusion on the subject without reading the voluminous evidence taken by the Royal Commission—which is not yet printed—and therefore it is impossible now for the Government to give a pledge as to whether they will introduce legislation on the subject this year. I can only say what every one must feel—that the subject is of a very grave character; indeed, as regards our internal affairs, I cannot conceive one of a graver character. My noble Friend (the Earl of Sandwich) asks me whether Railway Companies are bound to obey the recommendations of Government Inspectors. The answer to that is clear. Of course they are not bound to obey those recommendations, nor to regulate their conduct on the Reports of Inspectors. Those Reports are made to the Board of Trade. The Board of Trade considers them and recommends to the railway companies anything which it thinks advisable and which the law enables it to recommend. If there is anything which it thinks advisable, but which the law does not enable it to recommend, it must apply to the Legislature.

House adjourned at a quarter before Six o'clock, to Thursday next, a quarter before Two o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Tuesday, 13th February, 1877.

MINUTES.]—NEW MEMBER SWORN—James Delahunty, esquire, for Waterford County.

SELECT COMMITTEE—Public Accounts, nominated; Public Petitions, appointed and nominated.

PUBLIC BILLS—Ordered—Voters (Ireland) *. Ordered—First Reading—Criminal Law Practice Amendment* [78]; Mercantile Marine Hospital* [79]; Bar of England and of Ireland* [80]; Peerage of Ireland* [81].

Second Reading—Beer Licences (Ireland) [57]; House Occupiers Disqualification Removal [25].

MALTA—TAXATION ON GRAIN AND FOOD ARTICLES.—QUESTION.

MR. POTTER asked the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, If it is the intention of the Government to take any steps for the abolition of the taxes on grain and other articles of food imported into the Island of Malta?

MR. J. LOWTHER: Sir, objections against these taxes have from time to time been urged upon Her Majesty's Government by my hon. Friend and others. The question is, however, one of Revenue, upon which it is impossible to arrive at a decision without some further local inquiry. My noble Friend the Secretary of State therefore proposes to institute such inquiry at the earliest possible period, and to avail himself for that purpose of the assistance of an experienced officer from one of the public Departments in this country, who is specially qualified to advise upon such a subject.

CEYLON—THE RICE TAX.—QUESTION.

MR. POTTER asked the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether the Government intend to take steps to abolish the Duty on rice imported into Ceylon; also the Tax on the growth of rice, commonly called the Paddy Tax, and the revenue farming of the same in that island?

MR. J. LOWTHER: Sir, a Committee has already been appointed by the Government of Ceylon (in consequence of a Motion introduced into the local Council) for the purpose of inquiring into this question. Until the Report has been received, no action can, of course, be taken in the matter by Her Majesty's Government.

INHABITED HOUSE DUTY,

32 & 33 VICT., CAP. 14.—QUESTION.

MR. THOMSON HANKEY asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether it is his intention to propose any alteration in the Inhabited House Duty Act, so as more clearly to define what is a trader under which denomination exemptions may be granted for Inhabited House Duty under the Act 32 and 33 Vic., cap. 14?

THE CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER, in reply, said, that the hon. Member was probably aware there were cases upon this subject at present pending in the Exchequer Division of the High Court of Justice, and it was therefore impossible for him to answer the hon. Member's Question until he (the Chancellor of the Exchequer) saw from the decisions in those cases what was held to be the present state of the law with reference to it.

TURKEY—THE DISMISSAL OF MIDHAT PASHA.—QUESTION.

MR. A. MILLS asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether any official information has been received as to the circumstances connected with the deposition of Midhat Pasha; also as to the riots reported in the newspapers to have recently taken place at Constantinople?

MR. BOURKE: Sir, we have not yet received details as to the dismissal of the late Grand Vizier and its causes; but we have information both through the Turkish Embassy and by telegram from Constantinople to the effect that the change of Ministers involves no change of policy, and that the reforms proposed by Midhat Pasha will be proceeded with. We have heard nothing of any riots.

RAILWAY ACCIDENTS COMMISSION—THE EVIDENCE, PAPERS, AND REPORT.

QUESTION.

MR. HENRY SAMUELSON asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, When the Evidence upon which the Report of the Royal Commissioners upon Railway Accidents, the Papers of Messrs. Harrison and Galt, and the separate Report of Earl Delawarr, are founded, will be in the hands of Members; and, whether he can account for the absence from the Report of the Royal Commission of the signature of Mr. Ayrton, one of the Commissioners?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS, in reply, said, that the evidence on which the Report of the Royal Commissioners on Railway Accidents was based was extremely voluminous, but he had given orders that its printing should be pressed forward as much as possible. With regard to the absence of Mr. Ayrton's signature, he only knew that Mr. Ayrton was present at the last meeting of the Commission which was summoned for the purpose of signing the Report; but that he refused, as he had a perfect right to do, to attach his signature to it. He had not received from Mr. Ayrton any separate statement giving his reasons for refusing to sign the Report.

Afterwards in reply to Mr. BENTINCK,

SIR CHARLES ADDERLEY said, the Report having only just been issued, it would be premature for the Government to say whether, and how far, they could attempt to legislate upon the subject that Session.

ARMY—MISSION OF ROYAL ENGINEERS TO TURKEY.—QUESTION.

SIR HENRY HAVELOCK asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether, with reference to the Eastern Question, he would take the necessary steps to cause to be laid upon the Table of the House, in addition to the Papers on that subject, a statement showing.—1. The rank and names of the several Officers of Royal Engineers who have, since August 1876, been sent to Constantinople and other parts of the European and Asiatic territories of Turkey; 2. The dates of their being severally so despatched and their arrival; 3. The instructions under which they proceeded; 4. A detail of the duties for which they were sent, and of the duties on which they have been employed since their arrival in Turkey; 5. Under whose authority they proceeded, seeing that this country is at peace with both Turkey and all the adjoining countries; 6. Also whether the services of these Officers were solicited by the Turkish Government?

MR. GATHORNE HARDY: Sir, in reply to the hon. and gallant Member, I have to inform him that he is at perfect liberty to move for the rank and names of the several officers of Royal Engineers who have been sent to Turkey since August, 1876. With respect, also, to the second paragraph of the Question, he is quite welcome to have the date of that despatch; but when he comes to ask the third and fourth paragraphs, inasmuch as those officers were sent out for the information of Her Majesty's Government, and not for the information of the public, I must decline to give the information he asks. They proceeded under the authority of the Commander-in-Chief and myself, and their services were not solicited by the Turkish Government.

SIR HENRY HAVELOCK: I beg to point out that the right hon. Gentleman has failed to answer the second part of the second paragraph of the Question, as to the dates of the despatch and arrival of these officers.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY: I really thought it was unnecessary to repeat every word; but the hon. and gallant Gentleman is perfectly welcome to have the dates of their despatch and arrival.

"IRTON."—QUESTION.

MR. PLIMSOLL asked the President of the Board of Trade, Whether his attention has been called to the case of the "Irton," of Whitehaven, which is alleged to have arrived in Bristol with ore in an overloaded condition, so much so that even the owner's load-lines on both sides were under the water; and, whether, if the account be true, it is the intention to punish such a breach of the Law?

SIR CHARLES ADDERLEY: My attention, Sir, has not been called to the state of the Irton on her arrival. There may be information in possession of the officer in charge of the district which has not yet reached the Board of Trade. The Notice of the Question having only appeared this morning, I have not had time to ascertain whether the statement that this ship came home overloaded from a foreign port is correct. As soon as I receive information, I will communicate it to the hon. Gentleman.

THE LOAD-LINE.
QUESTION.

MR. PLIMSOLL asked the President of the Board of Trade, Whether he is aware that on the 30th ult. there were twenty-nine vessels in the West India Docks, none of which had a load-line painted upon them; that on the 31st ult. there were in the East India Docks forty-three vessels, only eight of which (seven iron and one wood vessel) had a load-line painted upon them; and, what measures he is prepared to take to secure a better observance of the Act passed last Session on this subject?

SIR CHARLES ADDERLEY: I am not aware how many vessels may be lying in any dock with or without a load-line. Probably there are a good many timber ships in the India Docks which are not proceeding to sea, and will not proceed till the spring, and many of them may have no mark on them at present. The Act orders the load line to be marked before entering a ship outwards upon any voyage, and to be retained till her return. The mark may vary with the voyage, and would not be put on a long time before, and if a ship is lying up and cleaning the last mark would very likely be effaced in dock, and it is the express intention of the Act that it may be altered for every voyage. As to what measure may be necessary to secure a better observance of the Act, I can only say that I have every reason from information and my own observation for believing that the Act is very generally and very usefully observed.

“OGMORE.”—QUESTION.

MR. PLIMSOLL asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether he is aware that a part of the crew of the “Ogmore” (which was detained at Weymouth on Thursday by the Board of Trade on the ground that she was unseaworthy) were sent to Dorchester Jail for refusing to proceed to sea in that vessel; whether, seeing that Mr. Turner, the principal shipwright surveyor of the Board of Trade, has declared the “Ogmore” to be unsafe, he will direct or has directed the release of those seamen; and, whether it is in his power to grant the seamen so imprisoned any compensation for the injustice they have suffered?

SIR CHARLES ADDERLEY: It is true that part of the crew of the Ogmore were committed by the magistrates of Weymouth to jail for refusing to go to sea. The Secretary of the Marine Department of the Board of Trade having reason to doubt the seaworthiness of the ship, sent the principal shipwright surveyor, Mr. Turner, to make a further survey, and he detained the ship in the act of going to sea with another crew on finding her masts unseaworthy. Upon this the Board of Trade immediately applied to the Home Secretary to release the men from jail, and they were released. The hon. Member for Derby sent a memorial to the Board requesting that this might be done, which arrived the day after, confirming the justice of the course which had been pursued. With regard to compensation, I need only say that the seamen so imprisoned have a remedy against the owner or master under the 9th section of the 85th chapter of 36 and 37 Vic., under which provision the owner of the Goldfinder of Greenock was lately very severely mulcted.

TURKEY—DECLARATION OF THE EM-PEROR OF RUSSIA—QUESTION.

MR. B. SAMUELSON asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, with reference to the telegraphic despatch of Lord A. Loftus to the Earl of Derby, dated Yalta, November 2nd 1876, containing the following words:—“He (the Emperor of Russia) hoped that the unjust suspicions entertained in England of his policy would be discarded. He pledged his honour that he had no views of conquest or of Constantinople, and repeated this declaration several times in the most solemn manner;" and to the reply of the Earl of Derby of November 3rd, that "Her Majesty's Government have received with the greatest satisfaction the assurance which the Emperor has given you," and "You will speak in this sense both to His Imperial Majesty and Prince Gortschakoff; and, whether the contents of those despatches had been communicated to the Prime Minister on or before the 9th of November?"

EGYPT—THE SLAVE TRADE IN THE RED SEA.—QUESTION.

MR. ANDERSON asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether, during the last three years, any attempt has been made by Her Majesty's Government to get a Treaty for the suppression of the slave trade negotiated with Turkey, so as to give us better control of the traffic from Africa by the Red Sea and elsewhere?

MR. BOURKE: Sir, Her Majesty's Government have been in communication with the Government of Egypt on the subject of the slave trade in the Red Sea, and the draft of an anti-Slave Trade Convention has been prepared. It will probably be sent to the Consul General at Cairo in the next few days. Negotiations with the Turkish Government on the same subject were begun some time ago, but have been temporarily suspended for the last 18 months in consequence of the state of political affairs.

LOCAL GOVERNMENT (IRELAND). QUESTION.

MR. SULLIVAN asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland, Whether, in view of the application to Parliament of the Municipal Council of Dublin for an enabling Bill to effect certain reforms and improvements in that city, it is the intention of Government to facilitate the purpose of the said Council by aiding special legislation for Dublin, or by introducing a general measure for improved powers of local government in Ireland?

Mr. B. Samuelson

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH: Sir, I believe that the application of the Municipal Council of Dublin to Parliament is for a local improvement Bill. I know of no reason why Parliament should interfere in private legislation for the City of Dublin any more than for any other municipality of the United Kingdom. With regard to the second part of the hon. Member's Question, whether the Government intend to aid the purpose of the Council by the introduction of a general measure for improved powers of local government in Ireland, that is a question of a wide and indefinite character. The hon. Member is aware that a local inquiry has been in progress in Ireland in relation to the subject of local government and taxation of towns, and when that inquiry has been completed, it is probable the Government will introduce some legislation on the subject.

PARLIAMENT—MEETING OF THE HOUSE—ASH WEDNESDAY.

Resolved, That this House do meet To-morrow, at Two of the clock.—(Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer.)

EAST INDIA FINANCE.

MOTION FOR A SELECT COMMITTEE.

MR. FAWCETT, in moving that a Select Committee be appointed to inquire into the Finance and Financial Administration of India, said, he rejoiced that he was able, through the courtesy of the hon. Member for Peterborough (Mr. Whalley), and the hon. Member for Cork (Mr. M'Carthy Downing) to bring forward thus early in the Session a Motion which would afford the House an opportunity of showing that, whatever might be their opinions on the Eastern Question, they were not indifferent to subjects deeply affecting the welfare of India. Any one who had the most cursory acquaintance with Indian finance knew that every question connected with the administration of that great dependency, every measure that might be adopted to promote the well-being of her people was inextricably bound up with the present condition of her finances. A great statesman some years ago said that finance was the key of our position in India, and however true that might have been a few years ago it was doubly so now, for events were each year happening which more conclusively showed that no service that could be rendered to India was of such pressing importance as to place her finances in a more satisfactory position. But apart from that general consideration, there were special reasons that induced him to ask for inquiry just now. It would be in the recollection of many that in the Session of 1871 a Committee to inquire into the finances of India was appointed on the Motion of his right hon. Friend the Member for Greenwich (Mr. Gladstone). That Motion was identical in terms with the one he intended now to move, for he thought he might safely follow in the footsteps of his distinguished Friend. His right hon. Friend then thought the inquiry was of such unusual importance that, in the first instance, he proposed that the Committee should be a joint one of both Houses; but the suggestion not meeting with general favour in the House was abandoned, although in the very significant debate to which it gave rise the present Prime Minister, remarking that Indian finance was a subject which directly affected English taxpayers, said—

“The ill-management of Indian finance must recoil ultimately upon the financial resources of this country.”—[3 Hansard, cciv. 774.]

He also endorsed the doctrine held by almost all the preceding speakers, that it was inadvisable to ask for a joint Committee, because it was a subject that ought to be dealt with by that House alone, and in consequence the idea was abandoned. A Committee of that House, therefore, was nominated, consisting of 32 Members, including some of those holding the most important positions in the present as well as the late Government. It commenced its labours in 1871, and they were continued through the Sessions of 1872 and 1873; but the subject which had to be inquired into extended over so wide a field, and such a great amount of evidence had to be taken, that at the close of 1873, the last Session of the late Parliament, the inquiry was not completed, and the Committee unanimously recommended that they should be re-appointed. Among those who joined in that recommendation were the present Chancellor of the Exchequer and the present Home Secretary, and that being the case, he would ask those right hon. Gentlemen if it was true, as rumour informed him, that they were going to refuse the Committee of Inquiry which he was about to ask for? He would call upon them to say, in explicit language, why, having concurred in the strong recommendation that was made, on the ground that the evidence had not been completed in 1873, they were of opinion in 1877 that further scrutiny was unnecessary? He was curious to hear from the Chancellor of the Exchequer, one who could speak with the knowledge of a former Indian Secretary, what had happened in India during the last six years to make him think that Indian finances, which in 1873 required a most scrutinizing examination from a Committee of that House, now no longer needed the same close investigation. Did he think that the occurrence of two terrible Famines within that brief period, Famines which had, and would, he feared, put a severe strain upon the finances of India, could be pleaded as a reason why the House of Commons should concern itself less with Indian finance? Did he think that what was brought to light last year by a Committee of that House on the depreciation of silver over which his right hon. Friend the Member for the City of London (Mr. Goschen) presided should make them less solicitous about India's present financial condition? Was not the grave inconvenience then, with a striking reality, shown of having permitted the Home Charges to so constantly increase that now nearly one-third of the entire Revenue of India was spent in this country? Surely one who had, like the right hon. Gentleman opposite, made the reduction of the English Debt occupy the foremost position in his own financial policy could not view with complacency the constant additions which were made to the Debt of India, and could not think it a subject which needed no inquiry, that India's financial position was one of such extreme tension, that all her resources seemed to be so entirely exhausted, that any item of exceptional expenditure could only be met by a fresh loan? It was particularly to be noted that the Committee joined in recommending its re-appointment in 1873, not simply because the inquiry had not been completed, but especially because only two Natives of India had been examined, and the Committee—

"had received a communication from Her Majesty's Government that steps would be taken to provide for the expenses of Natives of India who might be selected by the Government and approved by the Committee to attend before them for the purpose of giving evidence, in accordance with the recommendation contained in their former Report; and arrangements were being made for the attendance of these witnesses before the Committee at the commencement of the next Session."

Under these circumstances, if the accidental occurrence of a General Election and a change of Government were used to bar further inquiry, what was the interpretation which would be put on the proceeding by the people of India? The inquiry, it would be said, was allowed to go on until some of the people themselves were about to be called upon to give evidence, and then the whole thing was got rid of by a side wind, which he was afraid would be regarded as a somewhat unworthy and ungenerous device. But what occurred after the General Election? On the 20th of April, 1874, the noble Lord the present Under Secretary for India (Lord George Hamilton) moved for the appointment of a Select Committee to investigate the Home Charges. At that time he (Mr. Fawcett) was not a Member of the House, but so far as he could discover from Hansard the Committee was moved for without a word of explanation, and the Motion agreed to without a word of debate. The Government, he understood, thought it was better to divide the inquiry, as it were, into separate departments; but the fact remained that the present Government and the present Parliament unanimously agreed to an inquiry in 1874. The Committee, consisting of 21 Members, was nominated on March the 30th, a Member of the Government—the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Shoreham (Mr. Stephen Cave)—being elected Chairman. It began taking evidence on the 12th of May, and on the 28th of July a Report was agreed to, the concluding paragraph of which was as follows:—

"In conclusion, your Committee would suggest that, as they have not had time to investigate the various Home Charges which are not connected with military expenditure, they should be re-appointed next Session. As much evidence was taken in reference to these Charges by the India Finance Committee, which sat during the three previous Sessions, it is probable that the inquiry might be completed within a reasonable period."

Mr. Fawcett

He would not say that that recommendation had been treated with contempt, but it had certainly been as completely ignored as if it had never been made. The following Session, so far from the inquiry being continued, a Committee was appointed to inquire into certain officers' grievances, an investigation which could not diminish, but might and did add to, the Charges on the Revenues of India. If the Government intended to resist his present Motion, he could not divine to what excuse they would resort; they were absolutely precluded by their own words and acts from saying that no further inquiry was needed. Happily, it was unnecessary for him to bring forward any opinion of his own to support a demand for renewed inquiry. In 1873 the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer, the Home Secretary, and two other Members of the Government united in asking the House to grant further inquiry. At the close of the Session of 1874 the same demand was renewed by the official Representative of India in that House, and by every other Member of the Committee. There was nothing he should more deeply regret than to say a single word which would add to the difficulties of those who were responsible for the government of India at a time of no little anxiety, but he felt constrained to say that a refusal to grant further inquiry and a determination to arrest it just at the point when some of the people themselves would have an opportunity of being heard, would inevitably suggest many suspicious, and undoubtedly produce a most unfavourable impression throughout the length and breadth of that country. He had heard it said, but he could not vouch for the truth of the assertion, that the Government would not re-appoint the Committee because it would prove embarrassing to the Indian officials, who were already burdened with the troubles attendant on the Famine. Well, if that was to be the excuse of the Government, they would have to give valid reasons for upholding it, for it was particularly to be noted that the Famine of 1873-4 was at its height when the Government appointed the Committee of 1874. Lord Northbrook was not embarrassed by investigation at a time when he had a Famine to deal with, but, on the contrary, his hands were strengthened and the cause of good government in India was promoted. So far as he had been able to judge, those who had had most experience of official life in India were those who were most anxious for the fullest and freest investigation; but apart from that, he believed he should be able to show that the events of the last three years had given renewed force to every consideration which prompted the late Government in 1871 to propose a Committee of Inquiry. Within a very brief period different parts of India had been visited by two widespread famines, the consequence of which had been that millions of people had been reduced to the verge of starvation. To alleviate their distress, the Government had to provide for their subsistence, a proceeding that involved an expenditure which it had been altogether beyond the power of the ordinary revenue to meet. An addition of, probably, not less than £12,000,000 would consequently have to be made to the Debt of India. To a country as wealthy as England such an expenditure would be serious; to a country as poor as India it was disastrous and perilous. So severely had all the sources of new and increased taxation in India been strained, so completely had all the sources of revenue been used up, that when any emergency occurred it had to be solely met by increased borrowing. Now, a pay day must come at last, and increased borrowing could in the end lead to no other result than increased taxation, and increased taxation, as they had been told by one whose warning the present Government should at least heed, the late Lord Mayo, would be, in the present condition of India, a "political danger the magnitude of which could not be over-estimated." Again, Sir William Muir, a statesman whose judgment they had reason to respect, had stated that the depreciation in the value of silver, "from whatever point of view considered, was the gravest danger which had yet threatened the finances of India." No doubt there had been a recovery in the value of silver, but he would be a bold man who would say that its value was certain to be maintained. As a depreciation in the value of silver would be a misfortune of incalculable consequence to India, he wished to direct particular attention to the fact that it was unanimously admitted by the Committee of last Session, that of all the causes which contributed to bring about a depreciation in the value of silver, not one was more potent in its influence than that increase in the Indian Home Charges which was constantly going on. If it was objected that the terms of his Motion were too general and wide in their scope, he could only say that, being anxious to follow the precedent set by one of the greatest authorities of that House, he had taken the exact words of the Motion of the right hon. Member for Greenwich. He thought, moreover, he should be showing greater deference to the House if, instead of indicating in the Motion the subjects which most urgently needed inquiry, he left this to be decided by the Committee, should it be appointed. The Government had been of opinion that a Committee ought to be appointed to inquire into the increase in the Home Charges when their effect had not been recognized; but now that they had discovered that these Home Charges affected the value of silver, they said that any one who proposed an inquiry into Indian finance was proposing that which was superfluous and unnecessary. It was not, however, difficult to indicate some of the subjects upon which an authoritative expression of opinion from a Committee would be most desirable. Any one who turned to the Report of the Committee of 1873 would find that the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the Home Secretary felt a keen anxiety to ascertain how it had come to pass that there had been a large increase in military expenditure in India, accompanied by a considerable diminution in the numerical strength in the Army. Could they think it unreasonable if others in 1877 shared their anxiety, and felt the same desire to throw some light upon this important and interesting fact? Again, he believed there was not a financier of authority who did not think that the finances of India could never be placed on an intelligible and satisfactory basis so long as the present distinction between Ordinary and Extraordinary expenditure was maintained. Experience derived from the Continent should warn them that a resort to Extraordinary Budgets had not unfrequently been the last desperate resource of embarrassed Governments. Then, the Public Works expenditure in India was in a maze of inextricable confusion. No one could tell what was the exact financial result of any work that had been executed; and when money was wasted through blundering and mismanagement it generally seemed impossible to discover who was responsible. Those hon. Members on the other side of the House who were so solicitous about local taxation in England would find that there were in India questions connected with local taxation which would afford an inexhaustible field for the employment of their reforming zeal. The subject of pensions most urgently needed careful investigation and revision. Pensions were granted and held in India on conditions which would not for a moment be allowed in our own country. It was, he believed, the invariable rule of our own Civil Service that when any one who was in receipt of a pension again accepted office under the Crown, and received a salary, his pension was suspended; and though that was the custom in a rich country like England, yet in a poor country such as India both salary and pension continued to be paid. He would not incur the risk of wearying the House by the enumeration of a long list of not less important subjects which earnestly needed investigation. Any one might discover them for himself who turned to the evidence given before the two former Committees. Beyond that, the House would be stultifying itself if it appointed a Committee on two occasions and refused to re-appoint it a third time to complete its work. Wide as was the field of inquiry, the work of the new Committee would not be so great as might be supposed, because the whole of the evidence which had been taken before the previous Committees might be referred to it, and there would be an unusual opportunity of readily using this evidence, because it had been, with the greatest industry, most admirably indexed by Mr. Ayrton, who for three years presided with so much ability over the Committee appointed by the late Government. With regard to the Amendment of which the hon. Member for Cambridge (Mr. Smollett) had given Notice, he thought it was a very strange one, and he could not understand how the hon. Gentleman brought it forward as an Amendment. He believed it was brought forward in no spirit of opposition—[Mr. SMOLLETT: Hear, hear!]

—because the only difference between them was that the hon. Member thought the House was in a position at once to decide on some of the most important points connected with the financial position of India. In a previous Session he (Mr. Fawcett) proposed a Resolution almost identical in terms with that of the hon. Member. It was on that occasion said from the Treasury Bench, [in reply to that Resolution, that as the Committee had been appointed, and as it had not completed its inquiry, until that inquiry was completed and it had had an opportunity of expressing its opinion, he would be treating the House with contempt if he pressed his Motion. They could not use that argument now. If the Government resisted further inquiry they were reduced to a pitiable, do-nothing position. Let one thing or the other be done. Let the Government either facilitate further inquiry, or let them at once say—“We disregard the opinion of two Committees who decided that further inquiry was needed; the House is in possession of ample information to enable it to express its opinion on any point connected with the financial position of India.” And now, before he resumed his seat, he should like, if the House would allow him, to make one appeal to hon. Members opposite. In the protracted debates which occurred when the Government of India was transferred from the East India Company to the Crown, leading Members of the House vied with each other in the expression of an earnest hope that India would never be made in that House the battle-field of Party conflicts. So far as he had taken any share in Indian debates, he thought the House would bear him out when he said he had never been actuated by Party motives. When the Party to which he (Mr. Fawcett) belonged was in power, and when his hon. Friend the Member for Elgin (Mr. Grant Duff) was the official Representative of India in that House, he believed his hon. Friend would acknowledge that they on Indian questions were not always in the same Lobby, that he did not give an undeviating support to everything his hon. Friend proposed, and that he did not express an unhesitating approval of everything he said. If he were now sitting on the Government side of the House, he should certainly not less earnestly press for an inquiry. He should do so because, fully and cordially endorsing the words of Lord Salisbury, he believed that the most effectual way of securing financial justice for India was for the House of Commons to be constantly watchful of her interests. If they were prepared to exercise that watchfulness, no labour which they could bestow on any work would every yield a richer harvest of results. Whatever might be their difference of opinion on some subjects, they must alike desire to unite the people of India to this country by the bonds of a stronger loyalty and of an increasing contentment. The most costly ceremonial, the most glittering pageant, would soon be forgotten. But a desire shown by that House to lighten the burden of taxation which might oppress the people of India, and to promote every measure which might add to their happiness and increase their welfare, would every day link together in a closer union the rulers and the ruled, and would place our Empire in the East on a firmer and securer basis. The hon. Member concluded by moving for the Select Committee of which he had given Notice.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL, in seconding the Motion, said, that while declining to pledge himself to entire concurrence in all the views which the hon. Mover had expressed on the subject of Indian finance, he was decidedly of opinion that it was most desirable that the Government should grant some inquiry of the nature which his hon. Friend had asked for. He would not express any confident opinion as to what body the inquiry should be entrusted to; and he was rather inclined to think that a Joint Committee of both Houses of Parliament, so as to obtain the benefit of the large experience of Members in the other House, would be preferable. The matter might, perhaps, be entrusted to a Royal Commission, including Members of both Houses of Parliament; but in any case he trusted that an inquiry in some form would be granted. Whatever shape the inquiry might assume, there were few, he imagined, who would deny the necessity which existed for a periodical review of Indian affairs generally, and especially in connection with the finances of that country, with respect to which, under the rule of the East India Company, there had been a continuity of policy, which during the last 20 years had given place to a system of oscillation from one extreme to the other. He had served under both the East India Company and the Crown, and he thought that the Government of the former had some advantages over the present. There was not, for one thing, the same see-saw in policy. Under the East India Company's regime, the administration of India was solemnly and carefully reviewed every 20 years by inquiry at the instance of the Houses of Parliament, and great benefit resulted from that practice. Now that the Government of India had passed to the Crown, no such periodical review had taken place. Another result of the change in the government of India was that the affairs of the country were dealt with in a very desultory and unsatisfactory manner in that House, where it was very rare, and he hoped an omen for good, to see so large an attendance as on that evening when Indian subjects were under discussion. As things now stood, all those men who were most remarkable for their knowledge of India were put, as it were, into a cellar, for the Council deliberated in secret, and the world was deprived of all public expression of their views. This, he thought, was all the more to be regretted, because the Government of India had become a matter of greater difficulty than it was before; they had now a larger territory to administer than formerly, as well as to deal with internal questions of greater magnitude and intricacy. Of late there had been manifested a disposition to say—"You must not attempt to deal with these things in this country, but you must trust your Government in India." It was rather too much the practice also to think that the Government of India was the Viceroy. People were rather apt to overlook the Council of the Viceroy, and to lay upon him the whole strain and stress of the Government. What he believed to be the situation was, that they did not get men of the same political eminence to accept the position of Viceroy as they did in the old days to accept the position of Governor General. They did not send men who had had the rank of Cabinet Minister, and who had reached the highest rank in this country. They sent men, good, no doubt, but men who had been in no high position. The same difficulty arose with regard to the Finance Ministers whom they sent out. For a time they did send out several distinguished men to deal with the finances of India, but he understood that of late years it had been difficult to get such men to leave this country. The consequence was that on several recent occasions it had almost become the practice that the Finance Minister should not be sent from this country but should be one of the Civil servants selected on the spot. They were very good men, but their training was local; the man who was selected by the Viceroy himself ceased to be an independent controller of Indian finance, and in some respects was a dependant of the Viceroy, selected from his own servants. The Viceroy, too, was assisted by the other Members of his Council, but instead of advising him as a body, several of the Members were specialists who were unprepared to advise the Government on matters unconnected with their respective Departments. Consequently, in these modern days, especially in regard to finance, the Viceroy individually had acquired an inexpedient degree of power, and the result was that the oscillations of policy to which he had alluded were now extreme, whereas formerly they were moderate. Now, he thought it an unsatisfactory state of things when a Viceroy of India was able of himself to control the whole policy of Indian finance, and in his opinion this was shown when Lord Northbrook did away with direct taxation in the country. The abolition of the income tax involved not only a question whether it should be imposed for any definite period, but whether some direct taxation on the richer classes in India should or should not be made a part of our system, and Lord Northbrook and his Council took different views on the question. He desired to speak of that noble Lord with all respect; but he was one of those Governors General who had not held high political position before going to India; when the financial question came before him he had not been long in that country, and he went out with certain preconceived ideas with regard to Indian finance. That noble Lord had confidence in his own opinions; he was accustomed to bureaucratic ways,

Sir George Campbell

and he was not inclined to take the advice of his Council, but to follow his own in a somewhat decided manner. There was at the time a great division of opinion both outside and inside the Council on the question of direct taxation. In the Council there was a great majority of Indian opinion in favour of maintaining a system of direct taxation, the Finance Minister also being of that opinion; but the Governor General was enabled to carry his views in favour of abandoning it by a small majority composed of what he (Sir George Campbell) called specialists, not having strong views of their own, and who did not oppose opinions to the Governor General. Under these circumstances, it was to be expected that the final decision would have to rest on the Home Government. He was very much astonished last Session to hear the Duke of Argyll state in the other House that he knew that Lord Northbrook was going to take a course in which he (the Duke of Argyll) did not concur, but he thought it was a matter which it was fair to leave to the decision of the Government of India. The result was that the great question with regard to direct taxation in India was decided by Lord Northbrook in favour of abandoning it, contrary to the view of the Secretary of State and the Home Government and the most experienced Members of his own Council. In his judgment, the responsibility of a change of that kind ought not to be left to the decision of a single man, however able and experienced; and this was one of the points which might be investigated by a strong Committee, such as his hon. Friend the Member for Hackney asked for. The late Mr. James Wilson, a man of great weight and experience, having examined into Indian finance, came to a conclusion which took the form of a new system of taxation, and a certain alteration of the financial system of India; but since his death all the improvements and changes which he introduced had been abandoned and swept away, until not a vestige remained. After Mr. Wilson's death came a period of reaction, of apparent prosperity, and the doctrine was advanced that India was to become prosperous and rich for ever by a system of public works, by means of extraordinary loans; but from personal experience he was able to say that it had resulted in great waste. The administration was very much localized, whilst the system of finance was centralized in a most extreme degree, and the consequence was that every local government had but a comparatively small incentive to increase and husband its resources, whilst it had the greatest possible interest to get as much as possible out of the central chest for its own local works. That was the second oscillation which occurred. Well, following this period of comparative prosperity, of high hopes and lavish expenditure, there came a sudden reaction. Lord Mayo and his Advisers, when they took charge of Indian finances, became possessed with the idea that those finances were being spent a great deal too fast, and that the Revenue was not in the satisfactory state which had been supposed. They were justified in that opinion, and they proceeded to adopt measures which would insure retrenchment and increase the Revenue, and those measures operated beneficially. Among other things, they gave to local governments limited powers of taxation. That was the third oscillation. But Lord Mayo was unhappily cut off by the hand of an assassin, and there came another distinguished man, Lord Northbrook, to whom he had already referred. That noble Lord, as he had said, went out with preconceived ideas as to Indian finance, and he put into practice those ideas which were directly opposed to those which had been entertained and put in force by Lord Mayo. Lord Northbrook withdrew the power of taxation from local governments, he abolished the system of direct taxation, and in many respects reversed the policy of Lord Mayo. That was the fourth oscillation, and then another change came about. Another Governor General—Lord Lytton—was appointed, and he was apparently inclined to adopt a financial policy extremely different from that of Lord Northbrook and very like that of Lord Mayo; this was the fifth oscillation. What he contended for was that the present system of change was undesirable and dangerous, and that it would be most beneficial not only to India, but also to this country, if the whole system were thoroughly sifted and examined by a body of gentlemen strong enough to test it and to lay down some general principles on which the finances of India and the administration of India might in future be conducted. What was to be feared was not so much excess of taxation—in that point he differed from his hon. Friend the Member for Hackney—as constant and violent changes in the system of taxation. He was inclined to think that the charge necessarily laid upon India might be borne by India; but if they wished to avoid constant complaints, discontent, and irritation, they must have a fixed and continuous system. They must introduce taxes deliberately and keep them on, not put them on one day to take them off the next, and then re-impose them. He wished to point out to the House that in India, when once a direct tax was taken off it was a most difficult thing to impose it again, and what he wanted was that in times of peace we should husband our resources. He could not but think the most important principles might be settled by a well-constituted Committee, as, for instance, the financial relations between the local governments and the Government of India; as to whether the latter were justified in spending up to the limit of income, or, whether in time of peace and prosperity there should not be a margin for the purpose of preparing for pressure caused by famine, the depreciation of silver, war, or any other cause.

One other subject of great importance might be considered by the Committee. Under the Native Government of India and down to the time of the East India Company, by far the greater part of the Revenues of the Indian Government was derived from the rent of land. That state of things had been greatly changed of late years. The Government had surrendered to individuals nearly half the rent of the land, and the consequence was that strong interests among landowners, great and small, had been created, and it became necessary to supply the deficit of Revenue by means of taxation in the modern European form. Some were of opinion that the right course had been adopted, others that it had not; and, in fact, there were two schools striving against each other in India, and it would be very desirable that some fixed principle was laid down on that subject also by able men, who would consider it without prejudice or passion. He thought that the whole question of land tenure and taxation in India could be dealt with by some authority such as that asked for.

There was another question he wished to touch upon—namely, as to the expenditure on Famine relief in India. This was a subject on which he might venture to speak with considerable experience, because he had felt the inconvenience of being subjected to public opinion without any rules being laid down for his guidance as to how he should act on such occasions. There had been great oscillation with regard to this question, and it was one as to which some settled principles should be arrived at by competent authorities, by which those who had to carry them out should not only be guided, but protected. At the time of the Famine in Orissa, all the circumstances were minutely examined by a Commission, of which he was a Member, and when the Bengal Famine occurred he was much assisted as the responsible administrator to deal with it by the experience he had acquired during the inquiries of the Orissa Commission. The Commission on the Orissa Famine, of which he was at the head, had not, however, weight and position sufficient to carry the adoption of their recommendations. He was overruled, and another system was followed which led in some degree to excessive relief being granted. In doing so, no doubt a mistake was committed, and some distinguished men after thus having had experience of the two extremes were desirous that some general principles should be laid down for guidance on similar occasions. Those principles were not, however, laid down at the time, and now another famine found us equally unprepared. The consequence was that the authorities had to give sailing directions while the ship was in the midst of the storm, and it was much to be regretted, although it was by no means matter of surprise, that differences occurred between the Government of India and the local governments that had to deal with the famine, each attributing blame to the other. If, however, the whole question of Indian finance was submitted to a body fully competent to deal with it, principles might be laid down which would be of the greatest use in future famines. He believed that the Government of India were now dealing with the famine, on the whole, in a discreet manner, and that they were not going too far either in one direction or the other. It would be, however, far easier and more satisfactory if the principles upon which the Government of India were acting had been decided upon before and not during the famine.

He believed that inquiry into Indian finance was necessary, not only because great oscillations of policy had occurred, but because the present state of Indian finance was, as his hon. Friend had pointed out, extremely unsatisfactory. Of late years, from one cause and another, there had been no margin to meet unexpected demands, and his hon. Friend was perfectly right in saying that whether it was that they had exhausted the capacity of India for taxation, or for any other cause, it was very unwise that the Government should run their expenditure so close to their Revenue. From the time that Lord Mayo's plans had been reversed there had been a continual deficit. It had been necessary to contract great loans. Loans were found to be necessary every year for unproductive works. And now the Famine necessitated further loans. The depreciation of silver was another cause of financial disturbance, and while Indian loans were thus increasing from year to year, it could not be said that a prudent course was being followed in regard to Indian finance. It was, therefore, most important that the question should be considered and dealt with by a proper body, which should decide whether it was necessary to add increased taxation or reduce the expenditure of India. His own impression was that if we were to modernize our system of Indian finance it might be necessary to introduce some additional taxation. This, however, should only be done after the fullest inquiry, and it should no longer be left to any individuals, however high, to put on and take off taxes, and alter the system at their own will and pleasure. If the Government would tell the House that after 20 years of Imperial Government the time had come—say in 1878—when a general review of Indian finance might fairly be intrusted to some high and competent body, he would recommend that the matter should be left in the hands of the Government. If, however, the Government intended to resist all inquiry as unnecessary, he should support his hon. Friend the Member for Hackney, and hoped he would divide the House on his Motion. He ventured, however, to hope that the Government would not take such an extreme course, but that they would promise an overhauling of the Indian finances which should be effected within a moderate space of time. The hon. Member concluded by seconding the Resolution.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That a Select Committee be appointed to inquire into the Finance and Financial Administration of India."—(Mr. Fawcett.)

MR. SMOLLETT in rising to oppose the Motion, and to move as an Amendment, to leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words—

"This House, viewing with alarm the financial deficits in our Indian Administration during the last ten years, and the constant additions made to the debt of India during that period, is of opinion that no new public work should be undertaken which would necessitate the raising of fresh Loans either in India or in England; and that, in order to place the finances of India on a satisfactory basis, the distinction which is now made between Ordinary and Extraordinary Expenditure should be discontinued," said, he regretted that he was under the necessity of following this course, because in the main he agreed with the views of the hon. Member for Hackney on Indian finance. He could not, however, bring himself to believe that by any Committee of the present House of Commons any proper inquiry could be made, or that any improvement would follow from investigations into Indian expenditure conducted by Members of Parliament in London. He very much feared that even amongst old Indians in the House there were not more than one or two, including himself, who had the smallest wish to introduce any diminution in the expenditure of our Indian Empire. He believed that the scope of such an inquiry as that proposed would be, moreover, too wide; the Committee would probably occupy more than one Session in their researches; they would accumulate a vast amount of untrustworthy evidence; and he believed that no useful result whatever would come from their labours. Probably at the end of two or three Sessions we should have a Dissolution of Parliament, and then the inquiry would come to an end.

Abundant information already existed which would enable the House to put its hand on the blots of our Indian Administration and put an end to them, and this might be done by way of Resolution and without the incumbrance of a Select Committee. The question of Indian finance was a matter of very grave importance, which was often criticised with much ability by the organs of public opinion out-of-doors, but which in that House never attracted the smallest attention. The cause of the disinclination felt in that House to listen to Indian debates was that Secretaries and Under Secretaries for India were selected, not because they knew anything of India, but because they knew nothing about it. These Gentlemen, through knowing nothing about India, contrived to make their statements as intricate, as unattractive, and as incomprehensible as they possibly could. They usually had a natural inaptitude for making their statements on Indian affairs emotional, and as if this were not sufficient to repel men from Indian finance, they manoeuvred, with great success, to delay to the latest possible working day of the Session the discussion of subjects connected with India. For the last two years—namely, in 1875 and 1876—the day for discussing the Indian Budget was deferred until the 10th or 11th of August, and, of course, at that period of the Session, on the eve of the great and inviolate festival of British sportsmen, the 12th of August, to bring on any debate on Indian subjects was a farce. If a Bulgarian atrocity debate were fixed for the 12th of August, with the right hon. Gentleman the junior Member for Greenwich (Mr. Gladstone) to lead it, it was probable he would have no audience to address. The conduct of the Indian debate on the 10th of August last year was most objectionable. For some weeks the hon. Member for Hackney had had on the Paper Notice of a Resolution he meant to move as an Amendment to the Motion that the Speaker leave the Chair, in order that the Indian Budget should be considered in Committee as it ought to be; but in moving that the Speaker do leave the Chair the noble Lord the Under Secretary of State for India (Lord George Hamilton) dragged the Indian Budget in by the head and shoulders. That, in his (Mr. Smollett's) opinion, was a very unusual if not an irregular proceeding; and although the hon. Member for Hackney brought forward his Resolution, the result of the irregularity was that the whole debate was a perfect muddle. Amendments were moved, and speeches were made on the taxation of cotton goods, and sermons were preached upon the depreciation of silver, the moral of which was that masterly inactivity was the best cure for that great grief. In this way the whole evening was wasted, and at 2 o'clock in the morning, when the reporters had gone to roost, and the benches were empty, the Amendment which had never been discussed was withdrawn; and the House recorded in Committee without debate or observation a Resolution showing that in the year 1874 India was in a state of insolvency. That was a great farce, the management of a debate in that way was, he thought, insulting to the people of India; and he rejoiced to find an early opportunity this Session of putting this Amendment on the Paper, and of compelling its discussion. The Resolution which he was about to move was identical with the Resolution introduced last Session by the hon. Member for Hackney. He had omitted a few words only in reference to the depreciation of the silver currency. The omission was made advisedly, because the precepts of finance enunciated in the Resolution were principles that ought to be enforced in India at all times, whether the rupee should yield 1s. 6d. or whether it should produce 2s. 6d. sterling in exchange. The Amendment, now submitted to the House, applied itself to two distinct points of policy. It condemned, unequivocally, the practice of borrowing large sums of money in each year without reference to income, for the purposes, as the Government stated, of local improvement, the power of borrowing being only limited, so far as he could see, by the power which the Government had of mis-spending the money. He should endeavour to show that enormous sums had been wasted. He should also show that the practice of drawing a distinction between Ordinary and Extraordinary Expenditure had been most mischievous. He believed it was made for the purpose of delusion, and was now continued for the purpose of confusion. If his Amendment were adopted and honestly acted upon he believed that the Viceroy and his Council would be enabled, within two years, to reduce the expenditure by £5,000,000 sterling annually, and if this object was accomplished, then a large surplus income would arise, by means of which the impost levied on cotton piece goods might be at once repealed, a tax which vexed the Lancashire manufacturers, and which the Secretary of State admitted was at variance with the principles of that divine but dismal science, political economy. [Laughter.] Hon. Gentlemen might smile, and officials and ex-officials on either side of the House might be set up to deride the idea that the expenses of the Indian Empire could be reduced £5,000,000 sterling annually, but he knew something about the subject of which he was talking, and that was a great deal more than many officials knew. He should contend that this reduction of £5,000,000 was perfectly feasible, and he should shortly state the reasons why. In 1876 the financial position of India was very much like what it was in 1868, which was the last year of the thriftless administration of Lord Lawrence. He spoke of the administration as being thriftless because the noble Lord during the two last years of his Viceroyalty seemed to be entirely sat upon by the Public Works establishments in India. In that year the expenditure had risen to £53,400,000, and the income was £49,262,000, showing an excess of expenditure over income of £4,100,000. Happily for India, the Conservative Government of that day—the Government of Mr. Disraeli—selected, as the successor of Lord Lawrence, an Irish Nobleman, who, though he did not stand in the first class of statesmen in Great Britain, proved upon trial to be the very best administrator that ever set foot in India. That Nobleman was the late Lord Mayo, who, on taking his seat at the Council in 1869, was astonished to find the entanglement and confusion into which the finances had fallen under the management of his predecessor. The new Viceroy saw the absolute necessity of immediate reform, he set about it with a will, by slightly increasing taxation and enforcing rigid economy in all Indian establishments. At the end of 1869 he intimated to the subordinate Governments of India his fixed determination not to allow another year to exhibit a deficit, and he kept his word. In the season of 1870-1 there was a surplus of £350,000, and next year one of £1,500,000. In 1871-2 the income of India was £50,100,000, and the expenditure £48,600,000, and there was a real surplus, not a sham one, of £1,500,000, after the payment of every charge in India and in England. Of the £48,600,000, £47,000,000 was spent on Ordinary establishments and £1,600,000 on Extraordinary Works. He mentioned these figures to show that Lord Mayo did not altogether stint the Public Works Department in that year. Comparing the expenditure of 1868-9 with that of 1871-2, it was found that Lord Mayo had reduced it by the sum of £4,800,000 in two years, and what he had done might be accomplished by any of his successors, provided that the officer charged with the administration of our Indian Empire was equal in ability, energy, and intrepidity to Lord Mayo. If the present Governor General—of whom he knew nothing whatever—had not that character, the sooner he was removed, bag and baggage, the better it would be for British India. For what was the position of affairs as shown in the Budget Statement produced by Sir William Muir in Calcutta on the 31st of March last? Sir William Muir estimated the Ordinary Expenditure at £50,300,000. That was exactly £3,300,000 more than Lord Mayo found necessary in 1872. Sir William Muir estimated the Extraordinary Expenditure at £3,800,000; £2,000,000 more than Lord Mayo permitted to be spent in 1872. Sir William Muir estimated the deficit at £3,000,000, but Lord Salisbury thought it would be £4,000,000, and money to that amount was actually borrowed in London in June last for the purpose of meeting that estimated defalcation in the year 1876-7. This position of affairs in 1876 was, he thought, very disastrous, and it was very discreditable to those who had brought it about. He did not know who was responsible for it unless it were the Secretary of State for India and the Indian Council. The present situation of finance in India was injurious to the good government of India by Great Britain, for all the advantages which India derived from our rule were marred and discredited in native estimation in India by the extreme expensiveness of our Government; and this expenditure would go on increasing unless that House adopted the Resolution with which he should conclude, and compel the Government of India to retrace its steps. He might be told there was no necessity for any pressure to be put on Lord Lytton and the present Government of India, because on the 1st of July last Lord Lytton had issued a proclamation stopping the expenditure on some of the Extraordinary Works recommended by Sir William Muir; but he placed no reliance whatever on that Proclamation. Those works were stopped because the rupee only yielded 1s. 6d. at that time; and he could not understand why works of this kind should be stopped; if they were really reproductive, they should rather be hastened to a conclusion. He placed no reliance on that Proclamation for another reason. Lord Lytton issued another Proclamation on the 1st of October, in which he admitted the responsibility of the Government to use State resources to develop the country. The Viceroy declared it to be his determination to borrow money to carry on Extraordinary Works, provided loans could be raised in India and made payable in Indian currency. Those two Proclamations were inconsistent with each other. They proved the necessity that existed for Parliament to insist that loans for this purpose should not be made either in England or in India. At starting, he (Mr. Smollett) had stated he was prepared to show that much of the money borrowed for making reproductive works was wasted. He would now proceed to do so. Members now present who attended at a discussion on Indian finance upon the 9th August, 1875, would recollect the arguments then used. He stated that the impecuniosity of the Government in 1874 and 1875 was not caused by the necessity of borrowing money for the Famine. When the Famine was threatened in Bengal there was £19,000,000 or £20,000,000 sterling in the treasuries of India in the shape of cash balances. That was £6,000,000 at least in excess of what was thought necessary in time of peace in India. At the present moment Sir William Muir estimated the probable cash balances in 1876 at £13,000,000; £6,000,000 was therefore available from those balances in 1874 and 1875 for Famine relief. The reason why loans were made to a great extent in 1874 and

1875 was that it was necessary to supply means to carry on the Extraordinary Public Works which were only extraordinary because they never yielded anything. He stated in 1875 that it was the great waste of the Public Works Department that required the borrowing of £7,000,000 in that year. He described that Department as the curse of India. The salaries and emoluments of the officers and servants amounted to £1,500,000 a-year, and for many years they required to be supplied with £10,000,000 sterling from the ways and means of the State to keep the establishment in full employment and out of idleness. That sum was £5,000,000 in excess of what he thought necessary for any useful purpose. One-half of the present permanent Public Works expenditure ought to be at once dispensed with, and until one-half of that establishment was dismissed there would be no good government in India. Referring to the manner in which the public money had been wasted, he called particular attention in 1875 to the Orissa Canal, an undertaking made for the purposes of irrigation and navigation. That work was purchased from an insolvent company in 1869 for a sum of £1,048,000, although, in his belief, if the Government had waited, they could have had it for nothing in one or two years. He spoke of the company as insolvent because all its subscribed capital had been spent, and because it had in hand a work which did not yield the smallest return. That purchase was a great mistake, an enormous job. Now, what had been the upshot of that purchase. Since 1869 the Government of India had spent £1,250,000 in improvements and extensions, and at the end of 1874 the total capital stood at £2,283,000, not including the interest on the original purchase-money nor on the advances made of £200,000 a-year. If an account was brought to the year 1877 the expenditure would be nearly £3,000,000 sterling. The canal, in 1873, was worked at a loss of £23,000. Another great work was the Madras Irrigation scheme, and he called attention to the scandalous manner in which enormous advances had been made to that company by three successive Secretaries of State. That work never yielded one single shilling. He moved in the course of the last Session for an official Return of the liabilities of that company, and found them to amount last July to £2,760,000. Upon these two works £6,000,000 of public money had been mischievously wasted. In 1875 he pointed out, on the authority of The Calcutta Government Gazette, works of irrigation which had cost £3,000,000, and which up to that time yielded no return. One of those works was the Agra Canal, which was opened in 1874 at a cost of £900,000, and he stated on that occasion, and repeated now, that the engineers in charge of the works had reported that, so far from yielding any surplus, the Government would probably lose £200,000 in working expenses in two or three years. No answer was given to these statements; none could be given. The noble Lord the Under Secretary of State stated in 1875 that he had received a despatch which showed that on an expenditure of £8,000,000 or £9,000,000 on irrigation works the profit was 5 or 6 per cent. Now, he disbelieved that statement, though it came from the Governor General. He disbelieved it because it met with a direct contradiction from the Secretary of State himself. Lord Salisbury went down to Manchester in 1875 to have a palaver with the gentlemen of that modern city, gentlemen who thought they knew a great deal about India, and probably knew as much as the Secretary of State. A deputation from the Manchester Chamber of Commerce represented to his Lordship that all the evils that India laboured under and all the deficits might be removed if he would spend £50,000,000 or £60,000,000 at once on irrigation works. What did Lord Salisbury say, in reply? He (Mr. Smollett) had The Times report in his hand. The noble Marquess said—

“That the Indian Government had had much experience in the matter of irrigation works, and they could scarcely yet be said to have had one genuine instance of financial success.”

The noble Lord added—

“Irrigation projects which had for their basis the former works of Native Rulers had in many instances been a financial success; but then, of course, that favourable appearance had been obtained by not charging the expenditure of the Native Rulers, and by calculating that all the receipts had accrued from repairs and extensions.”

Now, what was that but a circuitous mode of declaring that Indian officials cooked the accounts? Lord Salisbury went on in these words—

"In all these cases where we have begun the projects of irrigation for ourselves, we have not reached, I believe, in any one instance the desired result of a clear balance-sheet."

And then the Secretary of State for India adverted to the Madras irrigation and to the Orissa irrigation schemes, to which he had already called attention, describing them as awful failures. Now, he (Mr. Smollett) contended that these were strange admissions coming from the lips of a statesman who candidly confessed that for some eight years he had lived under the delusion that all irrigation projects in the East yielded immense returns in cash. He accepted them as genuine and truthful confessions, because during a long experience of public life in India he (Mr. Smollett) had never found a single official who, having spent large sums of money, ever admitted that he had been at fault, but these men went on spending and spending, blundering and blundering, to the bitter end. He would now proceed to speak on the second point of his Resolution—the way in which the public accounts were manufactured. The two separate accounts of ordinary and extraordinary expenditure were practically very mischievous, and he would show why. He had a seat in the House some years ago—in point of fact, he had sat in the House of Commons continuously from 1859 to 1869. During that period he listened with great attention to the debates on Indian Budgets, and he never remembered to have heard a suggestion made, or a hint given, that it was a desirable thing to carry a large sum of the expenditure in each year to capital account until the year 1866. The year 1866 was a remarkable year in political life. The Session of 1866 was the first Session of a new Parliament elected in 1865. Parliament was led in the Upper House by Lord Russell, and in the Lower by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich. They had a majority of 70 or 80; but the Cabinet fell to pieces in the first year of their management through the intrigues of a set of banditti who had a rendezvous in the Cave of Adullam. A new Administration was formed in the middle of the Session—the month of May; it was a makeshift Administration, for the Conservative Party had no majority in the House of Commons. At the head of it was the late

Earl of Derby, and the management of Indian finance was confided to a noble Lord who sat in the House of Commons by the courtesy title of Cranborne, which had since blossomed into a Marquessate. Lord Cranborne was now the illustrious Marquess of Salisbury. Lord Cranborne, called upon at very short notice to bring forward the Indian financial statement in 1866, performed his task with great ability. In a remarkably lucid speech he described the sources from which the Indian revenue was derived, and which amounted at that time to about £47,000,000 or £48,000,000. The noble Viscount showed in an equally clear manner how the sum of £48,000,000 was spent. The amount spent on irrigation and other ordinary and extraordinary public works was then about £5,250,000. Now, Indian finance in 1866 was in a much more satisfactory position than it was in 1876; for although there was not in 1866 an assured surplus, there was at least an apparent equilibrium of income and expenditure. At that time, too, every outlay was charged to the current revenue—nothing was hidden, no large disbursements were carried to capital account. Lord Cranborne, however, did not think that this condition of affairs was satisfactory. He yearned for a great surplus, and blamed the Finance Minister in Calcutta, Mr. Massey, for sailing too near the wind in his Estimates. Lord Cranborne painted the finances of India as under a cloud, but the cloud had a silver lining, for his Lordship said he saw his way to a large surplus, not by putting on any further taxation, or enforcing a rigid economy. Setting aside these ordinary expedients for restoring the finances of a kingdom, a happy thought had struck his Lordship. To obtain a handsome surplus Lord Cranborne said it was only necessary to carry to a suspense account £1,000,000 or £2,000,000 of the annual expenditure of £5,250,000 sterling charged to the Head of Public Works. Assuming this sum to be surplus income everything would have a look of prosperity. Present and future Indian Secretaries of State would no longer be required to parade a beggarly account of empty boxes before a Committee of the House of Commons. They should have money in both pockets applicable to the repeal of taxation or the reduction of the public debt. This was a very curious proposal; it was the germ of the system of Finance now in active operation in our Eastern Empire. Lord Cranborne, however, did not remain in office long enough to carry out this new method of putting an end to financial deficits; the noble Lord resigned his appointment in the month of February, 1867. He had no differences with his Colleagues upon Indian matters, but he would not be a party to the leap in the dark which the Cabinet had resolved to take in regard to Reform. The right hon. Baronet the present Chancellor of the Exchequer succeeded to the office of Secretary of State for India. They all knew that the present Chancellor of the Exchequer was a man of great moderation of opinion, an excellent financier, the incarnation of common sense in the matter of finance, without a spark of genius, and genius was a very perilous gift to a Finance Minister. The right hon. Gentleman, possessing these qualities, was the last person likely to adopt the random suggestions of his Predecessor—in point of fact, he put them quietly aside. In introducing the Indian Budgets of 1867-8 he said he could easily have made a prosperity speech, showing wonderful surplus balances, but to do so in 1867 he must have carried to capital account huge sums spent upon barracks, many of which fortunately tumbled down before they were occupied by the troops; while in 1868, to make a prosperity speech, he said he must have carried to capital account £5,000,000 or £6,000,000 spent upon irrigation or other works from which he did not see his way to any immediate return. The right hon. Gentleman said that, under these circumstances, he would tell the truth and shame the devil; and accordingly he was compelled to admit that large deficits of revenue had accrued in each of these years. He (Mr. Smollett) had already shown that in 1868 there was an excess of expenditure over income of more than £4,000,000. On turning to the veracious pages of Hansard he found that on the 27th July the right hon. Gentleman stated in reference to the suggestion which had been made to carry large sums in each year to capital account that he looked upon that proposal with the greatest possible jealousy. He said—

dinary is one which I view with extreme jealousy. I assent to the principle, as it was enforced by my noble Predecessor (the Marquess of Salisbury), and I have adopted it in my Budget Estimate. I entirely agree with the principle that it is a fair and right thing to provide for that class of public works which are of a reproductive character by raising money on loan. I think it may fairly be compared to the conduct of a landed proprietor who keeps his household expenditure properly within his income, but for real improvements on his estate calls in aid his credit and borrows the money which, in the course of time, the improvement itself will repay. That is a perfectly legitimate operation; but he will be open to the great temptation of transferring to this land account a portion of his ordinary expenditure, which ought to be met out of the year's income. He will be inclined to add a new wing to his house, or to put a new conservatory in his garden, and thus he may go on borrowing to a greater extent than he is aware, and yet all the while he may appear to be keeping a pleasant account at his bankers.”—[3 Hansard, cxciii. 1844.]

Those were words of wisdom to which the successors of the right hon. Gentleman ought to have attended; they had been wasted upon the men who had recently swayed the financial destinies of India. That Empire had been going rapidly down on the road to ruin. The Government had expended and carried to capital account large sums which ought to have been charged to ordinary expenditure. Take, for example, the Orissa works. Since 1868, £2,500,000 had been spent upon this work, which had never yielded any return. Indeed, in one year there was a deficit of £23,000 upon working expenses. Every shilling of this £2,500,000 ought to have been charged to the ordinary expenditure of the years in which the outlays were made, for not one shilling of the capital spent would ever be recovered by the Indian Exchequer. The right hon. Gentleman (Sir Stafford Northcote) resigned office two or three months after he had made the speech to which he (Mr. Smollett) had referred, and he was succeeded by the Duke of Argyll. It was not his intention to criticize in detail the administration of this Statesman. It was sufficient for his purpose to say that His Grace the Duke of Argyll was apparently a sincere believer in the doctrine that surplus receipts could be got by borrowing money, carrying large sums in each year to capital account, and by taking good care not to account for the loans. Under the Duke of Argyll the downward progress of India financially was retarded, because in 1869-71 Lord Mayo was at the head of affairs, a man who would not be dictated to, who adhered to an honest policy, and who would not sanction the construction of any work if he had not surplus receipts in hand. When, however, Lord Mayo was struck down by the hand of an assassin on the Andaman Island, his policy was reversed, and during Lord Northbrook's administration India went rapidly down the road to ruin. He had in his hand a statement compiled from the Indian Revenue accounts, which showed that from the year 1867 to 1876 inclusive there had been carried to capital account the sum of £25,000,000, which must, to a very great extent, have been borrowed. During the same period the deficits amounted to £24,800,000, and deducting £1,800,000 of surplus when Lord Mayo was Viceroy, in the years 1870 and 1871, the excess of expenditure over revenue amounted to £23,000,000. That was a discreditable result in a time of profound peace, and who were responsible for it? Why, the Duke of Argyll, Lord Northbrook, and Lord Salisbury. But the most laughable thing remained to be told. During the whole of that period, while the administration was adding millions to the funded debt, India had been cajoled and this country deluded into the belief that there had been enormous surplus receipts, and that we had a glorious capital account fructifying at our bankers. That boast of a splendid balance was the topic of the day with official men. It served to bolster up a great delusion. Last year, when Lord Northbrook returned from India, he received great ovations from his political allies. At festive meetings in the Provinces much praise was given to him for the way in which he had administered the affairs of India, and his financial policy was lauded to the heavens. Now, it was that financial policy which he (Mr. Smollett) objected to and condemned, although he approved heartily of Lord Northbrook's general administration. The great merit, however, in popular belief of his Lordship's Viceroyalty was its financial successes. His friends declared these successes to be marvellous. In four years, they said, Lord Northbrook had placed £8,000,000 sterling of surplus revenue in the Indian Exchequer, a feat never before accomplished by any previous Viceroy. This, too, was the official belief. In his (Mr. Smollett's)

opinion these statements were pure fudge. The surplus receipts were imaginary—some £14,000,000 sterling had been borrowed in the course of the last four years. Year after year the Under Secretary of State had told the House that the finances of India were in a most prosperous condition, for they were borrowing money at 4 per cent and getting 7 or 8 per cent for it. [Lord GEORGE HAMILTON: When did I say that?] Well, he would withdraw that statement so far as it concerned the noble Lord; but assertions of that nature were made out-of-doors by gentlemen closely connected with the Indian Office. At a meeting held in the Hall of the Society of Arts, on the 5th of May, 1876, Mr. Cassells, a member of the Indian Council, took the chair, and a paper was read by Mr. Thornton, by which it was endeavoured to be shown that from an expenditure of £17,000,000 during the last 20 years upon irrigation works, the Government of India now realized a return of from 7 to 8 per cent annually. In 1875 the noble Lord the Under Secretary stated that the idea that the Government of India was unable to pay its way was an utter delusion—the very reverse was the truth. The noble Lord said that there had been a continuous surplus Revenue amounting to £4,695,000 in the aggregate during the last seven years, and that but for the Famine the surplus would have been £11,000,000. Lord Salisbury used the same rosy tone. In fact, his Lordship took a more sanguine view of the receipts than the Under Secretary of State, for on the 14th of March last, in "another place," Lord Salisbury insisted that from the year 1871 to 1874 inclusive, there was a positive surplus of £8,571,500. Now, assuming these statements to be true—assuming that 7 per cent was received from the irrigation works, and that there had been a surplus of £2,225,000 for four years—he asked how it was possible to reconcile assertions like these with the official replies given from the India Office to the Lancashire manufacturers. Gentlemen from Manchester asked for a repeal of duties yielding £800,000 a-year. The answer was, the impost could not be given up at present, because there was an excess of expenditure over income in each year. Yet in both Houses of Parliament the boast was made of large annual surplus receipts.

Both of these statements could not be true. He (Mr. Smollett) contended that the reply given to the petitioners for relief from taxation was the true one. It was clear that for the last four years there had been an excess of expenditure over income of about £4,000,000 sterling annually, and if the duty on cotton goods had been remitted, the deficit of Revenue would have been nearly £5,000,000 sterling per annum. He trusted that the House would no longer submit to be deluded by accounts framed as they now were, and would support the Resolution condemning the distinction made between ordinary and extraordinary expenditure. He trusted that there were men on his side of the House who had courage enough to do so. He desired to compel the rulers of India to return at once to the honest policy of Lord Mayo, which had been wholly departed from; and he hoped that the friends of that Nobleman who supported his administration while he lived and who lamented his sad death would unite to carry this Resolution. The late Earl of Mayo was the only Viceroy during the last 20 years who had had a real surplus Revenue, and he believed there never would be a legitimate surplus again unless the principles of policy which that Statesman had espoused during his life were rigidly adhered to by future Viceroys. In conclusion, the hon. Gentleman begged to move his Amendment.

MR. MELLOR seconded the Amendment.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "this House, viewing with alarm the financial deficits in our Indian Administration during the last ten years and the constant additions made to the debt of India during that period, is of opinion that no new public work should be undertaken which would necessitate the raising of fresh Loans either in India or in England; and that, in order to place the finances of India on a satisfactory basis, the distinction which is now made between Ordinary and Extraordinary Expenditure should be discontinued,"—(Mr. Smollett,) —instead thereof.

MR. C. B. DENISON said, he did not regret the criticisms that had been pronounced upon Indian finance by the Mover of the Motion under discussion or the Amendment which had been proposed, and of the hon. Members who had spoken upon the question; because, as a general rule, Party feeling was not allowed to interfere with the desire to ascertain the best manner of grappling with questions submitted for discussion in relation to Indian affairs. He had often impressed upon those responsible for the conduct of Indian finance the great danger of throwing the whole system into discord by the new-fangled system of mixing up the accounts relating to ordinary and extraordinary expenditure. At the same time, he could see no prospect of a Committee appointed in the present Session coming to a satisfactory decision, and he, therefore, found it impossible to support the Motion of the hon. Member for Hackney. He had sat on one Committee of that House which occupied three Sessions, and also on the Committee of 1874, appointed to inquire into the whole Indian accounts; and his opinion in favour of renewing that Committee was not such a strong one as to induce him to place much reliance on the result. He thought it would be better, under present circumstances, when the Government of India were struggling with a new famine, and with the consequences of the cyclone in Bengal, to take means to ascertain in what way the revenue and expenditure could be made to balance. It was quite impossible that the present state of things with regard to the finances of India could continue. The Duke of Argyll had initiated a policy which had led to the expenditure of £17,500,000, on the assumption that the public works would be remunerative; and therein lay the whole question. Unfortunately, every effort to make these works remunerative had signally failed, and he thought it high time that measures should be taken, both at home and in India, in order to go back to the state of things brought about by Lord Mayo during the short period of his Viceroyalty. The finances of India were in too grave and critical a state for a Committee to attempt to deal with them; and he would suggest that, inasmuch as an officer of high rank had been sent to India to inquire into the question of public works, and inasmuch as there would soon have been 20 years administration by the Crown, there should be an inquiry by a Royal Commission or otherwise, how that administration had been conducted; and he thought, therefore, it would be better to leave things as they were at present. He could not coincide with all the sweeping criticisms of his hon. Friend (Mr. Fawcett), though he believed that under them there lay a strong substratum of facts which it would be well for India that the Government should at no distant date attend to.

MR. ANDERSON observed that every argument used by the hon. Member for Cambridge (Mr. Smollett) and every statement he had made tended in the strongest way in favour of the Motion of the hon. Member for Hackney. The hon. Gentleman used very plain language; he had dealt out his blows right and left, his own friends coming in for the largest share of them; he repeated the phrase of "plundering and blundering," and talked about accounts being cooked; but the House could not accept such statements merely on the authority of the hon. Member. They needed inquiry to establish how far they were true, and how far they were not. Deputations had waited upon the Secretary for India, asking that the protective duties on cotton goods might be modified on the ground that they pressed grievously upon our manufacturing interest, and Lord Salisbury had informed them that while heartily participating in their views, he was unable to accede to their request in consequence of the financial position of India. But surely this sum of £800,000 per annum, which was raised by means of these protective duties, might be saved in some way or another, and thus enable this grievous burden to be taken off the shoulders of our manufacturers. The expenditure upon reproductive works appeared to be the key to the position of Indian finance. If such works were truly reproductive, and if they were executed with judgment, honesty, and economy, it was good policy to undertake them; but they would prove ruinous in opposite circumstances, and he was afraid that these works in India had been carried out without judgment, without economy, and he was afraid even without honesty. In all these circumstances he was of opinion that inquiry was necessary, and he should therefore give his voice in favour of the Motion of the hon. Member for Hackney.

MR. STEPHEN CAVE agreed with those who regarded this question as being a grave and an important one.

It was quite true, as had been stated by the hon. Member for Hackney (Mr. Fawcett) in his very interesting and moderate speech, that the great pressure occasioned by the state of the finances of India was a source of political danger, and the only question was whether the remedy proposed by the hon. Member, that of inquiry by a Committee of that House, was a proper one to meet the evil he had pointed out, and the speech of the hon. Member himself and those of the other hon. Members who had supported his Motion rather proved the contrary. In his opinion, questions of this kind could be very much better discussed in debates in that House than in Committee. The fact was that the Members of Committees appointed to inquire into Indian subjects, instead of being kept within the limit of 15 fixed by a former Resolution of that House, had been increased to 30, and comprised all the hon. Members, whether speakers or listeners, who were usually present when such questions came before the House. Therefore, hon. Members might just as well discuss Indian matters in their places in the House instead of going upstairs to take what had been termed untrustworthy and unsatisfactory evidence. Those hon. Members who had spoken this evening had shown that besides having given considerable attention to details, they were capable of grasping the subject as a whole; and, therefore, they were not likely to derive much benefit from any information they would obtain by further inquiry by a Committee, the Reports of which were almost always a matter of compromise between men holding different ideas. A very interesting debate was had upon Indian affairs in 1871, and that, at all events, was not open to the objection mentioned by the hon. Member for Cambridge (Mr. Smollett), that these debates were always put off until near the 12th of August, because it was held on the 24th of February. In that year the Government, in compliance with the suggestion of the hon. Member for Hackney, proposed that a joint Committee of both Houses should sit to inquire into the matter. This, however, was not agreeable to the House, and, eventually, a Committee of the House of Commons alone was appointed; and that Committee when it sat was presided over by that very able gentleman, Mr. Ayrton, who did his work admirably, and who, though he had lost his seat in that House, had not lost his interest in the subject, having since then compiled one of the most valuable records in the shape of evidence and a digest that had ever resulted from the sitting of any Committee of the House. That Committee sat for three Sessions, and it made a series of very short but very important Reports. In 1872 and 1873 Indian questions were amply discussed in that House, many of them being those which were pending at the time before the Committee. Many Members who took part in those discussions were no longer there to assist their deliberations. Mr. Eastwick, Mr. Fowler, Mr. Dickinson, Mr. Magniac, Sir Charles Wingfield, Colonel Sykes, were no longer in the House, but others with perhaps equal knowledge had taken their places. The other Committee to which the hon. Member for Hackney had referred was one over which he (Mr. Cave) had unworthily presided, and its inquiries were much more limited in scope than had been those of the preceding one. It simply inquired into the charges payable in this country for which the revenues of India were liable: though certainly he had had much difficulty in preventing the inquiry running wide of the mark. The Report of that Committee did not err through want of liberality towards India. It laid down as wide a proposition in favour of India as ever a governing country laid down for a governed country—namely, that there should be no expenditure of Indian revenues except for the purposes of India. But payments for the Army and the Navy, where they were employed for Indian purposes and payments for public works in India, came fairly within the terms of that proposition. That Committee inquired, among other matters, into the way in which India was treated at home, and whether the India Office could hold its own against the other offices of State, and whether the India Office itself was sufficiently careful of Indian interests. At that time an inter-departmental Committee, which had been sitting for some time, was endeavouring to bring to issue certain disputed questions between the War Office on the one hand and the India Office on the other, but it had come to a dead-lock.

Mr. Stephen Cave

Our Committee reported that although for some time matters had been very loosely conducted, they had then greatly improved. We further reported that the inter-departmental Committee ought to be strengthened by the adding to its members of the Departments an independent head, when it would then be better able not only to examine but to bring to a practical conclusion the questions that came before it. Some dissatisfaction was expressed as to the result of that Committee, it being stated that the War Office had been unduly favoured; but he was unable to express an opinion upon that point. He was ready to admit that the inquiry conducted by the Parliamentary Committee had been incomplete. The last resolution of that Committee was that it should be re-appointed the next Session for a very limited purpose indeed—namely, for the purpose of inquiring into the expenditure in this country on public works in India into Home charges unconnected with military expenditure. That was not his Resolution, and he confessed that he would rather it had not been passed, because he thought that ample information on this point was contained in the evidence before Mr. Ayrton's Committee; but, of course, he was bound by that Resolution. He doubted very much the utility of appointing a Committee for the purpose of inquiring into the general question. The fact that various subjects of inquiry had been proposed in the course of this debate showed that the House ought to be extremely careful about the appointment of any Committee; otherwise they would be involved in a general inquiry on such questions, as whether the transfer of the Government of India from the East India Company to the Imperial Government was an advantageous thing, for the hon. Member for Kirkcaldy (Sir George Campbell) went as far as that. That hon. Gentleman wished an inquiry into the relations of the Governor General and the Secretary of State and the unwillingness of statesmen in this country to go to India as Finance Ministers or as Governor Generals. [Sir GEORGE CAMPBELL said, he only used those questions as arguments.] But that was next door to inquiring into those questions. At any rate, that showed what was in the hon. Member's mind at the time. [Sir GEORGE CAMPBELL said, he only referred to those matters for the purpose of showing how widely the Members who had spoken differed.] Just so; that was exactly his own meaning. The hon. Member for Cambridge (Mr. Smollett) wished for no inquiry; but he wished the House to affirm principles, which were no doubt good to a certain extent, but could not be carried to the extent to which he wished them to be carried. You could not state a capital and revenue account of a country like that of a firm. The whole country was the capital, but when works were carried on by special loans, then no doubt Returns should show that the money which had been borrowed had been spent on those objects for which it was borrowed. He agreed that money should not be diverted from the objects for which it was borrowed, and if, as alleged, this had been done, it should be noticed and exposed. At the same time, he thought it was going too far to say that extraordinary public works were unproductive because they did not produce a revenue. It was well known from the evidence of the Committee which sat on the subject that the value of land, the value of produce, the rate of wages, and a great many other things had risen enormously in those parts of the country in which public works had been constructed. But it was quite true that it required the greatest possible care to prevent these things being done too rapidly, and, especially, to prevent their being wastefully done. Lord Salisbury stated his opinion before the Committee—that the true safeguard of India was the watchfulness of the House of Commons. He would rather see that watchfulness show itself in debates on all these questions than see them shelved, he might say, in the Blue Books of Committees. Still, he admitted that any objection that might be raised with regard to the way in which expenditure on those works was carried on, and especially as to the charges payable in this country might be a legitimate object of inquiry, as the Committee which sat on this subject pronounced it to be, and, as he had before said, he, for one, was bound by the resolution of that Committee, and could not go back from it. The inquiry ought most certainly to be limited to that, for if there was one thing wanted in India more than another it was the strong hand of government. There could not be a worse thing than appearance of divided counsel. Such a division would surely be exaggerated in India, and especially in the Native Press. With regard to inviting Natives to come to this country and give evidence in the House on any grievances, he must say he thought that was a proceeding which ought to be most carefully guarded against. There would be no lack of such witnesses, and the Committee would either excite false hopes, or be accused of shelving the question. He admitted the pressure, he admitted the danger; but, for reasons already mentioned, he viewed with alarm the re-opening of an inquiry before a Committee. The speeches he had heard that night confirmed him in his opinion that the fittest place for discussing Indian questions was the floor of the House of Commons.

GENERAL SIR GEORGE BALFOUR supported the Motion. He thought it would be a wise and proper course, especially at the present time, to appoint a Committee to inquire into the subject of Indian finance. Considering the position of Eastern affairs at this moment, it was necessary that we should show the world that India was governed not only on generally right principles, but with a prudent regard to her financial resources. Turkey's present condition was a striking illustration of the evils arising from an unsound system of finance; because it was mainly owing to the successive borrowings which we had permitted her to indulge in since the Crimean War that she had fallen into so disordered a state. Much of the oppression now and recently existing in Turkey was due to the necessity of raising money from the impoverished people to cover the interest on these constant loans. No doubt the wasteful extravagance of the Sultan in building palaces and laying in stocks of guns and arms as well as warlike machinery must also have increased largely the financial pressure. We ought to take warning from her deplorable experience and avoid the like system we were following in the case of India. Since 1857 hardly a year had passed without our raising money by loan on account of India, whose Debt within the last 20 years had more than doubled. He did not say that they ought under no circumstances whatever to borrow for Indian purposes; but he maintained that some limit should be laid down in respect to the contraction of such debt; and he had, therefore, hoped that the Government would have been only too glad to allow the House of Commons to appoint a Select Committee to investigate the state of the finances of India both as regarded the Indian and the Home Charges. As to the doubts expressed about there being no danger of Russian interference with our great Dependency, he might mention that her interference had led to the largest amount of Debt which India had contracted in the present century; and as long as Russia might approach to the borders of our Empire he maintained that the experience of the past showed that great commotions must be expected there unless we proved by good administration that our Government was more worthy of ruling over that part of the East than was Russia. In the event of these commotions arising it would be impossible to garrison India with our present Forces, and it would be necessary to increase the European and Native Armies at a cost of £10,000,000 or £12,000,000. Either the finances of England must bear a portion of this expenditure, or additional taxation must be imposed on India, which would be attended with the greatest danger. Our powers of taxation in India had been restricted by our own acts. And as we had not derived all the advantage we ought to have done from the land tax, we had been obliged to resort to other taxes, such as the income tax; and we had largely increased the salt tax, until in a few years we had quadrupled it in Madras, and raised inordinately the price of a condiment so necessary to the poorest classes of the population living mainly on a vegetable diet. In support of the demand for inquiry he urged that the Members of the House required, for the discharge of their duties, fuller information than they now possessed on many points of importance. The Home military expenditure of India was believed to be far beyond what was necessary for the maintenance of the garrison, and a burden was thereby thrown upon India from which she ought to be relieved. The provision and the maintenance of vessels for the transport of troops appeared enormous. About £4,000,000 had been spent in the annual maintenance of these costly vessels, and year by year these charges would increase. Now, considering the use that might be made of the excellent and efficient mercantile fleet engaged in the India trade it was a blunder to retain these vessels; there were no more costly white elephants than these transports. The extraordinary Budgets interfered with any real check on expenditure, and it became a question how to alter the form in which the accounts were made up so as to remove all inducements and opportunities to cook them. It was also desirable to ascertain how most easily to introduce a system of audit that would show whether all the liabilities of a year were or were not charged within that year, which at present was entirely wanting. With regard to the point as to irrigation works raised by the hon. Member for Cambridge (Mr. Smollett), he (Sir George Balfour) quite admitted that great mistakes had been made; and here, again, Parliamentary inquiry was required to ascertain why the vast expenditure incurred had not produced such satisfactory results as had been expected. But that inquiry would bring to prominent view the immense benefit to the Madras Presidency from the money spent on irrigation works. The labours and good services of Sir Arthur Cotton would then be fully known and appreciated. But it was not necessary to go to India to find such a state of things in connection with public works. An official Return, which would shortly be in the hands of Members, showed that on harbours in this country there had been an unprofitable expenditure which would probably surprise hon. Members. In spite of the failures, however, it must be admitted by the hon. Member for Cambridge, himself, that there had been a most marked improvement brought about by the irrigation works of the Madras Presidency. That hon. Gentleman was Secretary of the Board of Revenue of that Presidency in 1833, when a dreadful famine visited the country, and no doubt he was aware that districts which suffered severely then, but which had since had the advantage of irrigation, were comparatively free from the distress which at present prevailed.

MR. SMOLLETT: I had nothing to do with the Board of Revenue at that time. I was assistant in the Chief Secretary's office.

General Sir George Balfour

GENERAL SIR GEORGE BALFOUR maintained that the endeavour to guard against periodical droughts by means of irrigation works had been a very proper experiment, and he hoped that, profiting as much as possible by the mistakes of the past, Government would continue the attempt to store up water into the arid parts of India. He believed it could be done at a general cost of £2 for every acre irrigated. It was lamentable that famines should occur in districts where there were rivers full of water now running in a great degree into the sea, and affording an abundant supply of water which might be used to fertilize the soil. As to the administration of the Public Works Department, it had always appeared to him that the object Government had had in view had been merely to spend money, not to employ it to the greatest advantage; and that the failures in works of all kinds had been more due to faulty administration than to defects on the part of Government in deciding on the necessity of the work. One radical mistake was that minute supervision of the works had not been left to the local authorities, who were most interested in seeing that the money was properly laid out. That control was mainly centralized in Calcutta. He had never been able to realize the propriety of establishing an Engineering College in this country, on which they had already spent in one way or another £250,000 sterling. He very much doubted whether the experience and training which the pupils got here would supply a sufficient number of qualified engineers, and it was certainly a point that required full investigation. Another matter, which he thought might very properly be made the subject of inquiry, was that of the customs duties in India. There were now about 300 articles upon which import duty was chargeable, and he contended that all but three or four could be given up without any appreciable sacrifice of Revenue. The hon and gallant Gentleman concluded by referring to the system of military expenditure at home in connection with India, as well as to the outlay on military organization in that country as subjects which demanded inquiry. It was fully expected that the inquiry of 1874 would have been continued, but not only had that been set aside, but even information asked for in respect to the heavy demands on India for military expenses at home had been refused. He hoped the House would insist on the necessity of also completing those investigations into other questions which still remained unfinished. So far from any evil resulting from such inquiries the people of India would be glad to find that their affairs were being regarded with a watchful eye by the representatives of the English nation.

MR. ONSLOW mentioned the names of Lord Elgin and Lord Mayo, as a refutation of the statement which had been made that as good Viceroys could not be got now as formerly. The name of Lord Mayo would descend to the people of India and be as much prized as the names of Canning and Dalhousie. The hon. Member for Kirkcaldy (Sir George Campbell) was mistaken in supposing that the Viceroys of India procured the appointments of their own Finance Ministers, who were appointed by the Secretary of State in Council after mature consideration. As to the proposed Committee of Inquiry, he thought that after the experience of the Committee of 1871, which had sat for three consecutive Sessions, and taking into account the numerous subjects which were spoken of that evening as demanding investigation, it would be idle to expect that the labours of such a Committee would be concluded in the lifetime of any human being now in existence. He was, at the same time, of opinion that the question of Public Works Ordinary and Public Works Extraordinary in India and the division between them was one well deserving of consideration, for when the state of Indian finance was borne in mind it seemed to him to be somewhat appalling that the country should have been called upon to bear the enormous additional burden of £50,000,000 for irrigation works. A great portion of the money so laid out had, he was afraid, been expended in a very hasty way and on objects which had not been thoroughly considered. The fact was we had, he was afraid, too many irons in the fire in India, where, he contended, the true policy was to proceed gradually, so that so great a strain might not be put on her resources as in former years. As to such an inquiry as that which was suggested, however, by the hon. Member for Hackney (Mr. Fawcett), he saw no chance of its being productive of any practical good, for every diminution of expenditure which could be made had already been advocated and every increase of taxation which was possible devised. It was a very difficult thing to tax the people of India, who might be said to live from hand to mouth, and he believed the taxation at present was about as great as they could bear. As far as the Army was concerned, it might be taken as certain that if the Government reduced the expenditure they would be obliged to reduce the number of men; and the question, therefore, was one for the War Office and the Secretary of State for India to decide, and not for the House of Commons to express any opinion on. Such a subject, therefore, could not with advantage be referred to a Committee such as was proposed. There was another consideration to be borne in mind. India was a country subject not only to the ordinary fluctuations of finance, but also in a peculiar degree to famines, cyclones, little wars, inundations, &c., and it would be impossible for a Committee to lay down any general rules for the guidance of the Viceroy in the case of any of those calamities. Moreover, even although the appointment of a Committee was desirable on general grounds, it would be somewhat inopportune at the present moment. Lord Lytton had not been long enough in India to have gained a thorough knowledge of the country, and the Finance Minister (Sir John Strachey) had only been recently appointed; so that the action of the Committee would probably fetter their hands to an undue extent. He hoped, therefore, the Government would not accede to the appointment of the Committee now asked for, but that they would see their way to grant a Committee for the investigation of the expenditure in connection with Public Works, Ordinary and Extraordinary.

MR. DUNBAR said, he did not regard the proposal to appoint the Committee as at all inopportune. On the contrary, the appointment of a new Viceroy and a new Finance Minister rendered the proposed investigation desirable, more especially as the latter was not a man of the highest financial experience. Any attempt to discuss intricate Indian questions in that House without the information which the Committee could supply would be hopeless. The only result would be that a few Members would come down, and he counted out in half-an-hour. On every ground the best course was to refer such questions to the Committee, and thereby show the people of India that Parliament was alive to its duties. It was now some years since the Finance Committee was appointed, and in the interval there had been two famines and a cyclone, and the Debt of India had been enormously increased. Surely, if an inquiry was necessary then, it was much more necessary now.

MR. FORSYTH said, there were many questions in connection with India which would be much better discussed by a Committee of Gentlemen conversant with those subjects than by the House of Commons; and he thought his hon. Friend the Member for Hackney (Mr. Fawcett) had made out a strong case in support of his Motion, from the fact that the House some years ago had appointed a Committee, and that at that time the appointment was supported by several Members of the present Government. Every reason which had been urged in the course of the present discussion against a Committee being appointed now might with equal force have been urged when the Committee to which he referred was agreed to years ago. It had been contented that the Motion of the hon. Member for Hackney should not be adopted, because the Committee which he contemplated could not report during the present Session of Parliament. But why should it do so? What harm would there be if the Committee extended its labours over two Sessions? The Committee which had been formerly appointed sat for three Sessions, and yet a Resolution had been unanimously passed by the Members who composed it that it should continue its labours to future years. He could not support the Amendment of the hon. Member for Cambridge (Mr. Smollett), because it went too far, asking the House, as it did, to affirm a Resolution to the effect that no more money should in future be borrowed to be spent on public works in India. How could the House, with the limited information they possessed, adopt such a Resolution? The real reason which led him to give an implied support to the Motion of the hon. Member for Hackney was the inefficient manner in which

Indian affairs were dealt with in that House. He remembered seeing the Indian Budget brought forward at the close of last Session in a House consisting of 16 Members, and the present was the first time in his recollection when the subject of Indian finance was discussed at the commencement of a Session. He could not agree with his right hon. Friend the Member for Shoreham (Mr. Stephen Cave), that Indian subjects could be better discussed in that House than in a Committee. Upon every ground he thought the House should accept the Motion. No possible harm could be done by the appointment of a Committee, and he feared that, if the House peremptorily refused to make an appointment which would result in an inquiry into Indian finances—a matter of inconceivable importance to the millions in our great Eastern Dependency—the people of India would think that in a matter so deeply affecting their prosperity, the House of Commons were more than indifferent to their welfare.

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON said, no one could have heard the speech with which the hon. Member for Hackney (Mr. Fawcett) opened the debate without admitting that the hon. Member had been singularly fair, and that his argument was a very able one. The hon. Member had stated his case very clearly, and, undoubtedly, if circumstances had had not changed between 1871 and 1877 that case would have been a very strong one. While he differed from the hon. Gentleman on many of the views he had expressed with reference to Indian finance, he admitted that the hon. Member showed a sympathy with Indian matters and Indian affairs which he could wish many more hon. Gentlemen would emulate, for though he might be obliged to oppose many of the Motions made by the hon. Gentleman, yet opposition would be preferable to apathy. The subject which the House had now to consider was not merely the proposed appointment of a Committee, but the question of what good such an appointment would effect. As practical people, what they had to consider was whether the Committee would be likely to lead to an alteration and improvement in any of the many subjects which had been alluded to by many of the speakers during the debate. The hon. Member stated exactly the circumstances in which the Committee of 1871 was appointed. That Committee was an experiment—he did not think it was a very successful experiment. It sat for three years and did not report. It accumulated, no doubt, an enormous amount of evidence; but there was one very significant fact which had not been stated—the Committee when appointed consisted of 21 Members, and the quorum was seven. It was increased to 30 Members, and it was found necessary to reduce the quorum to five. That fact showed that the great bulk of the Members of the Committee either felt that the reference was so large, or the inquiries pushed by individual Members were so irrelevant, that it was not worth their while to continue their attendance. He had no doubt it was due to the large scope of the inquiry that it sat for three years and did not report. The hon. Member for Hackney correctly stated that the Committee referred to came to the conclusion at the end of 1873 that Natives of India should be examined as witnesses; and he went on to insinuate that because they had not been called, they had been shunted by a side wind, which was an unworthy and ungenerous device. There was, however, no ground for such an insinuation. The only side wind which had been at work at the time was a Dissolution of Parliament, which brought the Committee to a close. The first duty which devolved upon him as Under Secretary in the ensuing Session was to ascertain from several Members of the Committee who had been re-elected what their views on the subject were; and he was shortly afterwards asked by the hon. Member for Tyne-mouth (Mr. T. E. Smith) whether it was the intention of Her Majesty's Government to move for the re-appointment of the Committee? Replying to the Question he said that—

“The Committee had sat three years, and was composed of 31 Members. Of these 31 Members three had, owing to recent Ministerial changes, accepted posts which would not enable them to give their personal attendance on the Committee, even assuming that it was possible to re-appoint it. Of the remaining 28 no fewer than 13 had unfortunately lost their seats at the General Election, among them being the well-known names of Mr. Ayrton, the Chairman of the former Committee, Mr. Fawcett (who had since fortunately been re-elected), Mr. Eastwick, Mr. Crawford, and Sir Charles Wingfield. Under those circumstances it was not possible for the Government to re-appoint a Committee, a large number of whose Members were no longer Members of the House. At the same time, it was under the consideration of Her Majesty's Government whether or not it would be advisable to appoint a smaller Committee with a more limited reference, directing their attention to definite and tangible points connected with East Indian finance."—[3 Hansard, ccxviii. 337.]

Well, later on, he moved for the appointment of such smaller Committee, and that Committee sat for a year and made a Report. It was perfectly true that at the end of their Report the Members of this Committee suggested that they should be re-appointed, and, if he recollected aright, that suggestion was made on the Motion of the hon. Member for Hackney. It was perfectly true that Committee was not re-appointed; and as he had moved for its appointment, he was quite ready to take the responsibility of not moving for its re-appointment. He did not do so, for the simple reason that there was nothing further of a practical nature for the Committee to inquire into. That he was prepared to show from their own Report. According to their Report, they divided the Indian Charges payable in this country into two heads—the first dealt with wide and somewhat speculative questions of policy, the next with matters of detailed account. As to the second, there was nothing further to inquire into; and could anything have been more absurd than to have re-appointed 21 hon. Members to inquire into and report upon matters which dealt with wide and somewhat speculative questions of policy? He was ready to admit that it appeared inconsistent to refuse to re-appoint the Committee after its Members had been once appointed, and after the suggestion of the Report had been made that they should be appointed again; but, on the other hand, he believed it to be far better to have left himself open to the charge of inconsistency than to have re-opened an inquiry which could not have led to any practical result. But the Committee had sat for a year and inquired into military charges which were payable in this country; and what was the result of that inquiry? The Committee suggested the re-appointment of a departmental Committee, as they found it impossible to go into the enormous mass of details which the question in dispute between the War Office and the India Office involved. An inter-departmental Committee was then appointed, with Mr. Bouverie as Chairman, who made a Report, and at that moment he (Lord George Hamilton) was Chairman of a Committee to consider that Report. Therefore, the only result of the Report of the Select Committee was that, on its recommendation, an inter-departmental Committee was appointed whose Report was now under the consideration of a departmental Committee. That was really a strong practical objection to the appointment of a Committee, as the process seemed interminable before they could arrive at any definite conclusion. The great object of the appointment of the second Committee was, if possible, to limit the Order of Reference, because the Notice put on the Paper was so wide that it was impossible for any Committee of that House to arrive at a conclusion. Whatever objections he might have had to the appointment of that smaller Committee with a more limited reference had been immensely strengthened by the hon. Member for Hackney, because he said, "Only give me that smaller Committee, and there is not a question on Indian finance upon which I shall not be able to inquire." What the Government did not want was a roving Committee, inquiring here and there and doing no good; but if they had a definite Committee, they could refer definite points to them, in order to arrive at a definite conclusion. Then the hon. Gentleman said that in the next Session he (Lord George Hamilton) moved, not the re-appointment of this Committee, but the appointment of a Committee to inquire into the grievances of certain Indian officers, and the hon. Member insinuated that he had been almost too conciliatory in consenting to serve upon it. He did not think the hon. Member agreed to serve on that Committee from any excessive display of conciliation, but rather from an uneasy conscience, because the Committee had to deal with a question which had been taken out of the control of the Secretary of State for India by the House of Commons. In 1866 Lord Salisbury had to deal with certain grievances of the officers of the Indian Army. He made certain suggestions and proposals which were carried into effect. In 1870, however, Colonel Sykes upset that arrangement. The Government of that day opposed the proposal of Colonel

Sykes, but they were beaten, and among the hon. Members who voted against the Government and upset Lord Salisbury's arrangement was the hon. Member for Hackney. The Government had to send to India for information, and when it was received at the India Office, it was found that the Resolution of the House was recorded against the Secretary of State for India. The Government had all the information to enable the India Office to act upon the Resolution, and therefore Lord Salisbury authorized him to move for a Select Committee, on the understanding that, as the House of Commons had passed a Resolution upsetting his more economical arrangement, on that House must rest the responsibility of agreeing to a final settlement with those officers. The hon. Member for Hackney was asked to serve on that Committee, and he (Lord George Hamilton) admitted that the hon. Member readily served and performed his duty well. The hon. Gentleman said that the finances of India were in such a state that they could not meet any exceptional expenditure, but that it had to be met by a loan. The hon. Member had been erroneously informed. The hon. Member for Cambridge (Mr. Smollett), who had moved an Amendment, spoke and indulged in a great amount of strong language, and he showered his epithets right and left. In those which he particularly applied to him (Lord George Hamilton) he charged him with being incomprehensible and repulsive; but in the statement which he made concerning the Under Secretaries of State, and which he must notice, the hon. Member said—"We manœuvre with great success in order to postpone the Indian Budget." That was a statement which, as far as he was concerned, was devoid of the least shadow of foundation. The hon. Member for Cambridge used a great deal more strong language, which he did not think it was necessary for him to notice, except in one particular point, and that was that the officers, as he understood him, of the Public Works Department in India deliberately cooked their accounts. [Mr. SMOLLETT: Hear, hear!] He would state as deliberately that that was a statement which no Member of the House should make. They might indulge in strong language towards each other, because they all knew what it meant—that it meant nothing. The hon. Member for Cambridge could not, however, express himself otherwise than in strong language, but it was a very different thing when language of that kind was applied to English gentlemen serving thousands of miles away from their native land. They were naturally very sensitive as to what was said in this House, and it was neither proper nor becoming for a Member of the House to accuse all the officers of a large Department of the Indian Government of deliberately cooking their accounts. Whatever orders those officers received they acted on them, and he was certain that there was not the slightest intention on the part of the officers of the Public Works Department to lay garbled accounts before Parliament. As to what was said of himself personally, he did not care; but he spoke warmly on the subject, because it was his duty, as representing a Department, to reply—in the name of those who had no power to reply—to statements made in that House which he doubted would be made outside its walls. The hon. Member for Cambridge had also accused him of not understanding the various financial subjects he had to deal with; but he was afraid before he sat down he should have to convince the hon. Member that the hon. Member did not understand the A B C of the system which he attacked. He would, however, first refer to the subjects alluded to by other speakers. There was an evident impression on the part of the House that the Indian Government had great difficulty in balancing their ordinary Revenue and Expenditure; that they were in the habit of rushing into the Money Market on every occasion of difficulty; and that in consequence of the expenditure increasing in a greater ratio than the income the Indian Government was rapidly approaching a state of insolvency. He would first take the Ordinary Indian Expenditure, next the Extraordinary Expenditure, and lastly he would deal with the Home Charges. If hon. Members wanted to know the position of Indian finance now and what it was 16 or 18 years ago, they had nothing to do but to read the powerful and lucid statement of the late Mr. Wilson, who was sent out in 1860 to take charge of the finances of India. When he arrived in India he was obliged to estimate for a deficit for the past three years of £30,500,000. He proposed to put on additional taxation and reduce expenditure, but he was actually obliged to estimate for a deficit of £6,500,000. When he looked back upon the past, therefore, he found it to be much more gloomy than the present. He had heard favourable views expressed as to the management of the finances of India by the Court of Directors. But let the House look to the Returns from 1814 to 1860—a period of 46 financial years. The surplus in 13 years alone amounted to £8,895,437, and there was a deficit in 33 years of £72,195,416, and that was the condition of Indian finance when India was handed over to the British Crown. The Debt was, however, no doubt much smaller. During the three years—namely, 1857, 1858, and 1859—there was a deficit of £30,500,000 to be made up by loan in consequence of the Mutiny. All that excessive expenditure of £72,000,000 was unremunerative outlay for the purpose of meeting the deficits of succeeding years, or for war purposes, or perhaps for both. The position of Mr. Wilson was such as to lead any ordinary mortal to despair, but he so admirably estimated the finances that in a few years great changes occurred. He had great difficulties to contend with. He had an enormous Army expenditure to meet. Owing to the Mutiny in India there was an increase of 45,000 European troops. In addition, barracks had to be provided for the men, and this entailed an enormous and immediate expenditure on the Indian Government. Nor was Mr. Wilson able to make any corresponding reductions in the expenditure in the Indian Army, because the Government were bound to give the officers their pay, allowance, and pensions, whether they were employed or not. Whatever opinion that House might have of the East India Company, they did little more than maintain peace and collect revenue. When India was transferred to the Government of the Crown it was necessary to think of improving the condition of the people by promoting education and doing other things which in this country were undertaken by local authorities, in the absence of whom in India they devolved upon the Central Government. In 1860 and 1861 the financial revenue amounted to £42,900,000, and the expenditure to £46,900,000, leaving a deficit of

£4,000,000. In 1875-6 the revenue was £51,300,000, and the expenditure £49,600,000, showing a surplus of £1,700,000. [Mr. FAWCETT: That does not include Extraordinary Expenditure.] Certainly not; and unless you kept Ordinary distinct from Extraordinary Expenditure you could never understand the financial position of India. It was because he confused capital and revenue accounts that the hon. Member for Hackney (Mr. Fawcett) arrived at the conclusions he did. The great increase in the Revenue of India had not been the result of increase in the taxation. The income tax, which brought in £2,000,000, had been abolished, Customs duties had been diminished, and only the salt duty had been raised. The income tax affected only that class in India which was at present the least taxed of all—namely the well-to-do Natives. He did not blame Lord Northbrook for what he did. He was subjected to great pressure from the Home Government; but in looking back impartially upon what had occurred all must agree that the abolition of the income tax was a mistake. There had been a great increase in the trade of India. In 1860 it amounted to £63,000,000, and in 1875-6 it amounted to £104,000,000, conclusively proving that India was not excessively taxed, or it would have been impossible for the trade to have increased to such an extent if taxation had been of the nature described. The impression had been conveyed that the Government were in the habit of borrowing money to meet deficits caused by the excess of Ordinary Expenditure over Ordinary Revenue, but from 1860-1 to 1875-6 there had been surpluses as well as deficits; and notwithstanding exceptional expenditure, and including the first year when Mr. Wilson had to borrow £5,000,000, the surpluses exceeded the deficits by £793,000. From 1860 to 1875-6 not 6d. had been borrowed to meet the ordinary expenditure of the year, and yet the revenue had borne a number of new charges which were formerly charged to capital and raised by loans. From 1869-70 to 1875-6 the surplus of ordinary revenue over ordinary expenditure, including all kinds of expenditure, had amounted to £6,600,000, and, excluding famine expenditure, to £13,000,000. In ordinary years the surplus of ordinary revenue over ordinary expenditure might be estimated at £2,000,000. He did not say that according to the Budget Estimates that would appear, 'because the Government were very cautious in framing those Estimates; but, if hon. Members looked at the accounts they would find that was the result. Now we had to deal with two great disasters in the current financial year — a heavy fall in silver involving the loss of about £2,000,000, and the serious famine in Madras and Bombay. If there had been no famine, there would have been no deficit in consequence of the loss upon silver; but there would be a deficit on the present year, because of the famine. The finances of no country could stand such a drain as was put upon them by these disasters; and if they were to be anticipated by ordinary taxation, it would be heavier than was necessary for carrying on the government. He hoped, therefore, the House would get rid of the illusion that the Indian Government were unable to make both ends meet when a famine occurred, and were obliged to borrow, when the fact was that since the year when Mr. Wilson took charge of the finances every famine had been met out of the ordinary revenue, and yet there was a surplus. He would next refer to the extraordinary works. When Mr. Wilson went out, two classes of works were necessary—namely, unproductive works, such as barracks and civil buildings, which were chargeable to revenue, and reproductive works, such as irrigation canals and railways, which were necessarily undertaken by private companies with a Government guarantee, because there was no prospect of profit without such guarantee. The question at that time was whether everything was to be allowed to stand still or whether it was worth the while of the Government to undertake the works in order to develop the material prosperity of the country; and, on mature consideration, it was concluded that it was better to make the necessary guarantee an annual charge against revenue. The direct results did not adequately represent the advantages of such works, which were indirectly enormous, greatly increasing the strength of our military force, economizing administration, and increasing the wealth which was subject to taxation. In 1869 Lord Lawrence wrote an elaborate Minute, pointing out the enormous advantages that had accrued from the construction of railways, but pointing out that they had been constructed on an expensive system. The guarantee of 5 per cent had not secured economy in either construction or management. Lord Lawrence, therefore, suggested that the Government should undertake the construction of irrigation works and railways, and the principle then adopted was extended by Lord Mayo and Lord Northbrook. The only reason why there was apparently an annual deficit now was, that the whole of the annual expenditure upon the construction of irrigation works and railways was now charged against revenue, whereas formerly it was not shown as such a charge. He could not help smiling when the hon. Member for Cambridge found satisfaction in referring to certain years in which he said there was a surplus which was no sham, for, when account was taken of the guarantees at 5 per cent there was a deficit of £7,000,000, and, in later years, when he assumed there was a deficit, the whole amount of the sums expended upon these works was charged against revenue, although only a portion of that sum was borrowed not as formerly at 5 per cent, but at 4 per cent. It was in consequence of the extravagant system of guaranteeing companies that the Government of India undertook to construct their own works. They estimated the amount they might expend annually, but it formed no additional charge on the revenue of India, because there was an increased return on the older works, which would compensate for the works under construction for which money was borrowed. That was the principle on which the Government of India proceeded. There was a two-fold process going on. The annual loss on railways and irrigation works was decreasing, while the mileage and amount of irrigated land were annually increasing. It was further assumed that these works would be constructed out of borrowed capital; but the fact was that a considerable portion of them were paid for out of revenue. If the estimates and figures were correct, there could not be the slightest doubt that India was not rapidly approaching a state of insolvency. It was in consequence of the adoption of a certain form of accounts that the hon. Members for Cambridge and Hackney had placed before the House their gloomy views with regard to Indian finance. He was willing to admit that in the construction of these works there was an amount of risk; because the outlay was certain and the profit uncertain, and, therefore, they ought to be very careful; but he said unhesitatingly that the accounts for the last two years had turned out far better than the estimates for Public Works, and upon the whole the House could not complain of the state of the finances of India. Looking to the Revenue side of the account there would appear a deficit, but that was not what in England would be so called, any more than an expenditure by a railway company out of capital. On the other side they would see how that deficit was caused by the expenditure on Public Works Extraordinary added to the ordinary expenditure of the year. The Finance Minister of India kept his accounts in a different manner from the financial accounts of England. He had first to provide for the whole ordinary expenditure of the year out of the ordinary revenue. The actual account turned out better than the estimate, and this surplus, which in England would be a balance applicable to the reduction of Debt, was in India put into Public Works Extraordinary. The Public Works Extraordinary were provided for first from the surplus of the preceding year, and next by loan; the whole interest of the loan being included in the interest as Funded and Unfunded Debt, and charged on the year. The Indian Government had adopted a system of accounts which was too honest; for the system led most persons to put an interpretation upon the accounts which was not strictly accurate. Last year he stated that during five years no less than between £17,000,000 and £18,000,000 had been spent, and only £14,700,000 borrowed. The balance was made up of the difference between ordinary revenue and expenditure. Would any hon. Member support such a Resolution as that proposed by the hon. Member for Cambridge if it applied to a railway company? Substituting the two words, "Railway Companies" for "Indian administration" and "Revenue and Capital Accounts" for "Ordinary and Extraordinary Expenditure," how would the Resolution read?—

"That this House, viewing with alarm the financial deficits of Railway Companies during the last ten years, and the constant additions made to the capital account, is of opinion that no new railway should be undertaken which would necessitate the raising of fresh Loans, and that, in order to place the finances of Railway Companies on a satisfactory basis, the distinction which is now made between Revenue and Capital Accounts should be discontinued."

If it was necessary to extend railways in England it was far more necessary in India. The productive power of India was practically unlimited, and all that was required was facility of communication; and therefore he was sure hon. Members who would refuse to apply such a Resolution to any company in England would still more object to apply it to India. He would undertake to prove by applying any such Resolution to any railway company in the Kingdom, that it was rapidly becoming bankrupt. The constant practice was to annually increase their capital as against revenue. What they really wanted was a more accurate form of account. If they adopted the views of the hon. Member for Hackney, he could show that there was not a railway company in this country which was not bankrupt; but if increased communication were more necessary in India than in England why should they attempt to apply a principle in India which they would never adopt for themselves? He was ready to admit that this system of Public Works Extraordinary was an innovation. But it was remarkable that the instances to which the hon. Member for Cambridge alluded—the Orissa Canal and Madras Irrigation Works—were not constructed by the Government of India; indeed, it was the very failure of those works that had obliged the Government of India to construct their own works. It was contrary to our idea that the Government should undertake public works of a remunerative character; but if they wanted an accurate estimate of what they spent and of what they got for their expenditure they must alter the present form of account. With the valuable assistance of the Financial Secretary he hoped he might shortly be able to make proposals which would show what was their capital liability and what was their revenue, and then they could see whether the increase of their capital was met by a corresponding increase of their revenue. It was by an alteration of account and not by laying down any absolute rule that they could improve the public works system in India. The Resolution of the hon. Member for Cambridge was not worth the paper on which it was printed. There was a great famine in Bombay and Madras. Hundreds of thousands of people were employed on public works, and they were going to pay them out of borrowed money. If this House declared that no public works were to be constructed by borrowed money, and if he came down and said that it was absolutely necessary to infringe that Resolution, or otherwise that hundreds of thousands of people would starve, he ventured to say that the House, by an overwhelming majority, would support the Government. He was ready to admit that there might be some difference of opinion in regard to Public Works Extraordinary. He would not assert that they were not a proper subject to refer to a Select Committee; but what he would say was, that they ought not to be so referred at the present moment, because the policy of the Public Works Extraordinary expenditure was closely connected with our Famine policy. The more he considered the subject the more he was inclined to some policy which would throw a greater responsibility on the local authorities, so that we might say to them—"If you wish to construct those works you must find the funds." By some such system as that we should deal better with famines. We had now in India a new Viceroy and a new Finance Minister, and he was perfectly certain that suggestions would be made by both with regard not only to the treatment of famines, but of Public Works Extraordinary. It would be very unadvisable to appoint a Select Committee until the House was in possession of the views of the Indian Finance Minister, and of the Secretary of State for India, and then the Government would be perfectly prepared to refer this subject to a Select Committee, the reference to which should be carefully guarded, the question being whether it would be proper to continue this extraordinary outlay from public loans. One word with respect to the Home Charges to which attention had been directed. He was quite ready to admit, and had already stated, that it was the duty of every Secretary of State, if possible, to lessen the growth of these Charges. Admiration of private enterprise had, he thought, led them to borrow too much in the English market; they should borrow more in Calcutta and in India. The Secretary of State had pronounced a strong opinion on the subject, and therefore there was no need to refer the question to a Select Committee. One or two remarks now as to the position of the Indian Government. No one could be, for the short time he had been, in a subordinate position in the India Office without being struck by the great and increasing difficulties of the Government in India. They had established in India a Government which was perfectly unique in its character. They placed at the head of it a Governor General, whom they surrounded with civil administrators and military advisers, who were the ablest men that this country afforded. The Viceroy exercised a power and patronage such as no other subject enjoyed, and which did not always belong to Sovereigns. But although it was a great and powerful Government, every iota of the authority exercised by the Viceroy was derived from Acts of Parliament. They, a self-governing people in Europe, had established an absolute Empire in Asia. The action of the Indian Government should be strong, persistent, and continuous, its policy should be mature and well-defined. And yet there was not a small detail of policy in the administration of that great dominion, not an isolated act of the Government of 200,000,000 of people, which could not at any moment be reversed by a House 10,000 miles away, whose elements were as shifting as the sands of the sea. They were anxious to infuse every element of stability and permanence into the Government of India, yet they were forced to subject it to the control of an Assembly upon which every breath and every change of public opinion must leave its impress. How had these two elements been reconciled? Simply because Parliament had declined to interfere, unless it saw that good results would follow; and had placed the responsibility of governing India upon a Minister who was responsible to it just as the Home or Foreign Secretary was. Although, therefore, he was perfectly ready as far as he was himself concerned to welcome inquiry into any subject connected with Indian Administration, yet he thought they should not go and turn the whole of that Administration topsy-turvy unless they knew the objects they had in view. There could be no object, in fact, there was nothing but danger, in perpetually burrowing and undermining the authority of the Indian Government. If that were so on ordinary occasions how much more on the present. He did not wish to exaggerate the crisis through which they were passing, and he hoped he might be able to make proposals this year which would satisfactorily meet their temporary difficulties and which would tend to a solution of their more permanent difficulties. One of the writers of the present day had accurately described the Government of this country as nothing more than a Parliamentary Committee. The Secretary of State was one of a Parliamentary Committee, and he had control over the Viceroy of India for the simple reason that he was nearer to the centre of authority. The hon. Member for Hackney would be the last person to wish to embarrass the Administration of India. But if one of the Houses of Parliament, from whom all authority was derived, chose to delegate its powers to a Select Committee, was it possible to prevent the interference of that Committee with the action of the Government of India? They had now a new Viceroy and a new Finance Minister, both men of great ability, and they ought to give them fair play in the great crisis through which they were passing; and, if he might go a step further, he would say that the Secretary of State for India was a man in whom the great majority of the people of England had confidence. He was told that hon. Members on the other side were as ready as those on the Ministerial side to acknowledge the great services the Secretary of State had rendered in representing this country at Constantinople. But it was a somewhat curious way of showing the gratitude they felt by interfering with him in his own Department. ["No, no!"] He was sure the hon. Member had not the slightest intention of doing anything unfair. But suppose the Select Committee expressed opinions contrary to those sent out by the Secretary of State, would not that be interference with the Secretary of State? He thanked the House for the attention with which they had heard him. He quite admitted that the question of Public Works Extraordinary deserved attention. He could only state with regard to the Motion of the hon. Member for Hackney, he opposed it, not because he feared investigation, or wished to curtail the powers of the Committee, but for the simple reason that it seemed to the Government inopportune, and that its operations could not fail to be, to a great extent, mischievous; and if the hon. Member pressed his Resolution to a Division he would appeal to the practical sense of the House to assist the Government in refusing a Motion which was nothing more than an inopportune attempt to resuscitate a Committee which had already come to a natural and not altogether undesirable end.

MR. GOSCHEN said, he was disposed to defend the noble Lord against one of the strictures levelled against him by the hon. Member for Cambridge (Mr. Smollett), who said that Under Secretaries for India were anxious that the Indian Budget should be postponed till the latest day of the Session. In his opinion, on the contrary, the Under Secretary for India was the last person to wish to avoid a field-day; and the House had seen to-night, from the cheerful animation of the noble Lord, the great ability he had shown, the lightness and vivacity with which he had handled the subject, and his great industry in dealing with his figures, his surpluses, his Ordinary and Extraordinary Expenditure, that on no account would the noble Lord have wished to avoid discussion. He ventured heartily to congratulate the noble Lord upon the speech he had just delivered. Commencing by alluding to the Committees which had sat on Indian Finances and to the proceedings of those Committees, the noble Lord concluded with some general observations, in which he laid down the broad principle that to appoint a Committee was to supersede the Indian Secretary in the discharge of his important functions. Surely the noble Lord must have forgotten that the Leader of the House, the Home Secretary, and other Members sitting upon the front Ministerial Bench, had served with great satisfaction upon an Indian Finance Committee while out of office—a Committee which had sat for three years—and they did not appear to be of opinion that these three years had been wasted. The noble Lord said that so difficult was it to secure the attendance of Members, that it had been found necessary to increase the number of the Committee from 20 to 30, and even then it had been found difficult to secure a quorum, from which, he argued, that it would be unwise to re-appoint a Committee. If so, why did the Chancellor of the Exchequer vote for the re-appointment of that Committee? He (Mr. Goschen) preferred the unanimous opinion of those who sat upon that Committee—that it was desirable to re-appoint the Committee—rather than the opinion of the noble Lord which was formed just now. Then the noble Lord stated that, though this Committee was appointed with the approval of both sides of the House in 1871, circumstances had so far changed that it was no longer desirable that the Committee should sit. How had circumstances changed? Indian finance was now in a more critical position even than it had been five or six years ago, when the Committee was appointed. Since that time the finances of India had been threatened by dangers which then were hardly contemplated; and so far from a Committee being less necessary now, many grave questions had arisen which needed investigation in a still greater degree. The Committee would not be appointed with any view to supersede or interfere with the Indian Government while they were grappling with a famine, but to assist in interesting this House in the affairs of the great Empire for whose welfare the House were responsible with Her Majesty's Government. The useful Motion of the hon. Member (Mr. Fawcett) had led to as serious a debate upon Indian finances as had for some time been witnessed; and the noble Lord was to be congratulated that, instead of occupying little attention and speaking to empty benches, he had had the satisfaction of seeing that the House took a real interest in Indian administration. The supporters of the Motion asked the Government, then, not to cool that interest by refusing the materials and the information which were necessary for any useful discussion. He did not agree with all the reasons urged for the appointment of the Committee. For example, he did not think, as the hon. Gentleman (Sir George Campbell) suggested, that a Committee would prevent those oscillations which had occurred in Indian financial policy. No Committee, however long it might sit, would prevent such oscillations at home; and it would be impossible to prevent changes in cardinal questions of fiscal policy by any Committee of that House. But was the House sufficiently acquainted with the whole facts connected with Indian financial administration? The Chancellor of the Exchequer would not contend that the labours of a Committee, which would elucidate many difficult points and assist Members in taking part in Indian financial debates, would be wasted. If the reference were too wide, let the Government limit it; but he hoped they would not say—"There is no subject connected with Indian finance which we would wish to confide to the investigation of a Committee of the House of Commons." A broad distinction might be drawn between matters of policy and matters of fact. He agreed that there were many questions upon which no Committee would be able to arrive at so authoritative a conclusion as would our Indian administrators. On the other hand, there were several questions on which the House of Commons would be able to assist those who were intrusted with the administration of the Indian Government. There was, for instance, the question of the silver currency, which affected the whole financial system in India, and with regard to which the Committee proposed to be appointed might usefully consider the relations between England and India as to taxation and its payment in silver or gold. If last year the Government had not had the courage to resist the financial advice which came from India, a great mistake would have been made. As it was, the position taken by the Government at home, supported by the conclusions arrived at by the Select Committee, enabled the House of Commons to prevent the Indian authorities from taking steps which might not have been advisable. The question was one in reference to which the House of Commons had a perfect right to take steps in order to get all the information possible. The noble Lord had referred, in opposing the Motion to appoint a Committee, to the fact that a Committee had been appointed in 1874; but he seemed to forget that that Committee was appointed to inquire as to a different branch of the question, and its appointment was one of the reasons upon which the present Motion of the hon. Member for Hackney was based, because an unanimous recommendation of the Committee was that it, or another similar Committee, should be re-appointed in order to carry the inquiry through as regarded the whole of the questions involved. Although the Committee was not re-appointed it was, he thought, the general opinion of the House, that there were matters connected with Indian finance, in regard to which an inquiry might be usefully conducted by a Committee of the House of Commons. With regard to the scope of the inquiry, he had no desire that the Committee should deal with questions in reference to which the Indian Government was already working in the direction of reform; but he wished that it should deal with such other subjects as would properly come within its purview, and report at the end of the Session as to the results of the inquiries it had made up to that point. The House of Commons had already shown a great interest in questions affecting Indian finance, and he appealed to the Chancellor of the Exchequer not to check that interest which appeared to be growing, especially as the whole tone of the debate showed that there was no desire to embarrass the Indian Administration either at home or in India. The hon. Member for Cambridge (Mr. Smollett) had stated that, on the occasion of the Indian Budget, the debates got into a muddle on account of an Amendment that had been moved by the hon. Member for Hackney; but it was to be feared that this debate had got "into a muddle" on account of the hon. Member for Cambridge having moved an Amendment which, however important and interesting in itself, had really taken the House away, to a certain extent, from the question whether there should be an inquiry or not. The noble Lord, hearing certain criticisms on the conduct of Indian Administrators during some years, had taken the opportunity of vindicating generally the policy of the Indian Government; but that was scarcely a subject which the House could at present enter into. The noble Lord certainly took a very rose-coloured view of Indian finance in the statement he had made, and had forgotten one point which had been stated over and over again on both sides of the House—namely, that the taxation in India was such that in no emergency would it be possible to increase it. The state of Indian finance was such, though there might be a surplus in some years, as to demand serious consideration. Two millions for India was the ordinary surplus to which the noble Lord pointed, and that was a handsome sum; but in view of the great dangers involved in such an enormous outlay, and the immense difficulty of raising additional taxation in India, certainly the state of things was such as to require careful and anxious watching, and there was no Member of the House who would not deem it his duty to endeavour to form a judgment on these matters if they should come before it in the form of practical legislation. Members would not be able to discharge their duty satisfactorily if the Government did not assist them by placing before them the means that were at their disposal for educating themselves and for educating the country in regard to the facts of Indian finance. It was to be regretted that the Government had come to the resolution to refuse the appointment of a Committee. If they had been prepared to assent to the appointment of a Committee on a more limited basis, the hon. Member for Hackney would probably have been very willing to listen to some proposition of the kind; but to say that there should be no inquiry, notwithstanding the recommendations of former Committees, and because, there being a famine in India, officials could not have their minds distracted, was to throw more cold water on the growing interest in Indian finance than seemed either wise or expedient in the circumstances.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Sir, after the extremely able and exhaustive speech of my noble Friend the Under Secretary for India, I had thought that it would not have been necessary for me to have troubled the House with any remarks on this subject; but I feel bound to make a few observations in deference to the very pointed appeal which has been made by the right hon. Gentleman who has just sat down. He asks of myself and of some of my Colleagues the question which, undoubtedly, it is not unfair to ask—namely, how it happens that although we now object to the appointment of this Committee, we have on previous occasions served upon Committees of a similar character, and have joined in recommendations for their re-appointment. I would say this in regard to myself at all events—that the Committees which sat in 1871, 1872, and 1873, were appointed at the instigation, and on the initiation of the Government of the day, who were of opinion that it was desirable, for reasons stated at the time, to appoint those Committees to inquire into certain matters connected with Indian financial administration, and that I had the honour of being placed on those Committees. Certainly those Committees entered into a very exhaustive and minute inquiry into the accounts of the Indian Government, and among the results which I think were derived from that inquiry was this advantageous one—that officers of the Indian service, who were connected with Indian financial departments, came over here and were brought face to face with Gentlemen accustomed to the English financial system, and were subjected to examination, and were required to give explanations that led to a better understanding on their parts with regard to the mode of keeping accounts. With regard to our motives in recommending that the Committee should be re-appointed, it seemed to me undesirable at that time to close the inquiry until it had been brought to a natural termination, and had the late Parliament entered another Session it would perhaps have been well to have endeavoured to obtain some practical result out of the labours of that Committee. That, however, is speaking of the time that is past. These labours were necessarily left incomplete in consequence of the Dissolution of Parliament and the dispersion of the Members of the Committee; and I should like to know whether it is in the purview of the hon. Member for Hackney, in making his present Motion, that we should take up the work of that Committee and that we should undertake the duty of reading up and studying the whole of the evidence taken by the Committee. We are told that the labours of the Committee resulted in the production of a great deal of valuable evidence. I am quite ready to admit that; but I should like to know how many hon. Members of the House have made themselves acquainted with all that mass of matter. I think that it would not be at all an unprofitable undertaking if hon. Members who now take so much interest in Indian affairs and in Indian finance would, before they enter upon another inquiry, make themselves to some extent, at all extents, masters of the evidence which has been obtained by former inquiries. Several advantages have resulted from the inquiries which have already been held. Thus, by degrees, we have got rid of many delusions and misunderstandings which at one time were prevalent amongst us, and those who take an interest in Indian finance understand many questions which were sealed books to them before. Moreover, those inquiries have led to certain improvements in keeping accounts in India, and to the minds of certain Indian officials being directed to points which were not satisfactory. But in addition to that the last Committee led to the practical result of the appointment of a departmental Committee, over which Mr. Bouverie presided, and which brought to light things which it would have been impossible for a Committee of the House of Commons to have dealt with. I submit, therefore, that the previous inquiries have not been without useful and practical results. But what are we now expected to do? It is certainly not desirable to have a Committee of the House of Commons sitting en permanence on Indian finance. It would be a very serious step to take to advise the appointment of such a Committee, who might possibly begin to inquire into the amount of influence which the Viceroy ought to have in dealing with financial matters. The hon. Member for Hackney may, however, say that he would have the Committee appointed to inquire in some special matters; but it seems to me that the inquiry he proposes would have a very wide range, and that it would have very little definiteness in its object. We have not now more than some two or three Sessions remaining of this Parliament, and if we were to re-appoint the Committee of 1871, 1872, and 1873 we should merely accumulate the same mass of evidence without being able to attain any more practical result than the previous Committee secured. No doubt, Gentlemen might get a great deal of valuable and interesting information if a Committee were appointed; but you must bear in mind that the proposed inquiry would be a most serious inconvenience to the Administration of India. If the inquiry is to be worth anything, you must bring home your best officials from India in order that you may examine them. If you do not do that, you will do very little good; and if you do that, it would undoubtedly cause a great deal of inconvenience in India. My noble Friend does not deny that it may be desirable to have at a certain time further inquiries into particular points, and he has indicated one upon which at some future time it would, no doubt, be interesting, and might be very valuable, to have the opinion of a Committee of this House—namely, the system on which public works are pursued. But my noble Friend points out that if a Committee were now appointed you might cause great inconvenience to the Government of India just at the moment of a great crisis—just at the moment when a new Financial Secretary has gone over from this country and is anxious to supply himself with all the information at his command and the means of employing every official that he wishes to employ for the purposes of both grappling with a great emergency and considering this question in India. Not from a want of interest in India, far from it, but simply because we believe the appointment of a Committee at the present time would be inconvenient to India, we feel ourselves bound to resist the Motion of the hon. Gentleman.

MR. FAWCETT, in his reply, admitted that, on one assumption, he agreed with all the Under Secretary for India had said about the finances of India, for if the extraordinary expenditure were omitted, he agreed that the finances of India might be represented to be in a satisfactory condition. He contended that the extraordinary expenditure ought not to be excluded, and believed that a Committee would find that such expenditure being included, the finances of India were not in a satisfactory condition. He protested against the remark of the Under Secretary for India that the passing of this Motion would imply a censure on Lord Salisbury. Was it ever said that the passing of previous Motions for the appointment of a Committee implied a censure on the Secretary of State? As to the inconvenience which it was said the appointment of a Committee at the present time would cause to India, it should be remembered that when the Committee of 1874 was appointed the Bengal Famine was at its height. As he had obtained no satisfactory answer to his arguments from the Government, he must take the sense of the House on his Motion.

Question,

"That the words 'this House, viewing with alarm the financial deficits in our Indian Administration during the last ten years and the constant additions made to the debt of India during that period, is of opinion that no new public work should be undertaken which would necessitate the raising of fresh Loans either in India or in England; and that, in order to place the finances of India on a satisfactory basis, the distinction which is now made between Ordinary and Extraordinary Expenditure should be discontinued' be added, instead thereof," put, and negatived.

HER MAJESTY'S ANSWER TO THE ADDRESS.

THE COMPTROLLER OF THE HOUSEHOLD (Lord HENRY SOMERSET) reported Her Majesty's Answer to the Address, as followeth:—

I have received with much satisfaction your loyal and dutiful Address.

"Your assurance that the different measures which will be submitted to you will receive your careful consideration affords Me sincere gratification, and you may rely upon My cordial co-operation in your endeavours to promote the happiness and prosperity of My People in all parts of My Dominions.

PARLIAMENT—BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.—RESOLUTION.

MR. MOWBRAY moved the following Resolution:—

"That, except for a Money Bill, no Order of the Day or Notice of Motion be taken after half-past Twelve of the clock at night, with respect to which Order or Notice of Motion a Notice of Opposition or Amendment shall have been printed on the Notice Paper, or if such Notice of Motion shall only have been given the next previous day of sitting, and objection shall be taken when such Notice is called."

The right hon. Gentleman said, the only question in his mind was whether the time had not come for him, as Chairman of the Standing Orders Committee, to ask the House to make it a Standing instead of a Sessional Order. He was content however, this year, to move the Resolution in the same words as the House had previously passed it.

MR. GOLDSMID, in seconding the Motion, expressed the opinion that the time had arrived when this Rule ought to be made a Standing Order.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That, except for a Money Bill, no Order of the Day or Notice of Motion be taken after half past Twelve of the clock at night, with respect to which Order or Notice of Motion a Notice of Opposition or Amendment shall have been printed on the Notice Paper, or if such Notice of Motion shall only have been given the next previous day of sitting, and objection shall be taken when such Notice is called."—(Mr. Mowbray.)

CAPTAIN NOLAN, while admitting that there was a great deal to be said in favour of the half-past 12 rule, pointed out that its effect last Session had been practically to put a stop to the Bills of private Members at that hour, without similarly affecting the Government Bills. The present hour, he thought, was too late for the discussion of so important a question, and he begged therefore to move the adjournment of the debate.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Debate be now adjourned."—(Captain Nolan.)

MR. C. B. DENISON drew attention to the way in which Members sometimes put down their Bills day after day and failed to be present when they were called, thereby causing others who were interested in the subject to remain late in the House to no purpose; and he made the suggestion that when a Member had been absent twice consecutively under the circumstances, it should be open to any other Member to move the rejection of the Bill.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he hoped the hon. and gallant Member (Captain Nolan) would not press his Motion for an adjournment. The subject had been repeatedly before the House, and due Notice had been given that it would be brought forward that evening. Moreover, it was only a few minutes after 12 o'clock. He thought there would be a general if not a unanimous feeling that the Motion of his right hon. Friend, being identical with that which had been passed for several Sessions, should be adopted again. There were necessarily deficiencies in any Rule of this sort, and they were obliged to depend very much on the general good sense and good feeling of the House. But this half-past 12 rule, as it was called, had come to be very well understood, and, on the whole, he thought it had worked very fairly. One objection he had heard made, and which had certainly sometimes made itself felt, was that occasionally a Member would put down a Notice of Amendment against an Order which was not likely to come on very early, and would nevertheless be absent when the Order was called, and thus leave it blocked in a way which gave rise to much inconvenience. At the same time, it was impossible altogether to avoid inconvenience in matters of this sort, and he thought they ought to trust to the common courtesy of hon. Members and to the general feeling of the House that the object of such regulations was not to stop business, but, as far as possible, to save time. The Rule had, he thought, worked well on the whole, and he hoped, therefore, it would be adopted as it stood.

MR. BUTT said, that he was sorry he could not agree with those persons who thought that this Rule had worked well. The result was that the House had sat later than it had ever done previously during his experience of its proceedings, and he would oppose the Motion. He agreed with the Chancellor of the Exchequer that they would do better to trust to the good feeling of the House. He had charge of a Bill last year, and, a Gentleman having put a Notice on the Paper, went to Ireland for a month and obstructed during that time the progress of the Bill. Towards the close of the Session they had to enter into a compromise about the Bill different from what the House had assented to. Would the House wish to sanction that sort of thing? There was another result. This struck only at Bills of Irish Members. [Murmurs.] He meant to say of private Members—a phrase he did not like. If he stood alone he should record his vote against the Motion, as he thought this system of restriction objectionable.

MR. HEYGATE said, that when the hon. and learned Member (Mr. Butt)

spoke of trusting to the good feeling of the House he seemed to forget the causes which had led to the original enactment of the rule. It was the result of the inquiries of a Select Committee, composed of all the most experienced Members of the House, in 1871, appointed in consequence of the scandalous (for it was nothing less) scenes which had occurred in previous Sessions, when alternative Motions of Adjournment of the House and of the Debate kept them marching round the Lobbies half the night on more than one occasion. The Committee recommended almost unanimously that no opposed business of any kind should be commenced after 12.30. The rule was accepted in 1872 in its present shape, as modified by Mr. Gladstone, then Prime Minister, and though altered in 1874 at the suggestion of his hon. Friend (Mr. Dillwyn), so strong was the feeling in its favour, that it was restored to its original shape the very next Session by the urgent desire of the majority on both sides of the House. He (Mr. Heygate) had not proposed it this year, as he had hitherto done, because he felt the time was come when it must be made a Standing Order of the House, and he looked upon its proposal now by the Chairman of the Standing Orders Committee, as a step towards that desirable result as it was not expedient that a Rule so necessary for the health of Members and the decorum of their proceedings should be left to the accidental proposal of an individual Member in each Session.

MR. RICHARD SMYTH said, he thought that in this matter there might almost be said to be involved the persecution of private Members, and the driving of them to distraction. He deprecated the adoption of anything which would further curtail their privileges. He expressed himself decidedly opposed to the Amendment, of which Notice had been given by the hon. Member for Swansea (Mr. Dillwyn), for the extension of the proposed Rule to Wednesdays in reference to the quarter of an hour before the rising of the House at 6 o'clock.

MR. RAIKES said, there was good reason why Members should not wish to be kept in the House until half-past 12 o'clock, or it might be until 2 and 3 in the morning, in order to oppose any particular Bill which they regarded as an undesirable measure. A check should be put upon discussion in Committee on unimportant points after half-past 12 o'clock; but it would be the worst mode of arriving at that desirable end if they were to reject this Rule on the present occasion.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE strongly advocated a limit being put to the late sittings of the House.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Original Question again proposed.

MR. BIGGAR moved to omit from the Motion the words "except for a Money Bill." The half-past 12 o'clock Rule was a very salutary one.

Amendment proposed, in line 1, to leave out the words "except for a Money Bill."—(Mr. Biggar.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he hoped the Amendment would not be pressed, or if carried it might impede the progress of Public Business in the Departments. The Vote for the money was discussed before the introduction of the Bill.

MR. BUTT said, this Rule would not apply to Money Bills. They were merely matters of form. He hoped the Amendment would not be pressed.

MR. W. H. SMITH opposed the Amendment. It was essential that after money had been voted the Bills appropriating it should be passed as speedily as possible.

MR. BIGGAR said that, at the suggestion of "our leader, the hon. and learned Member for Limerick," he would withdraw the Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Amendment proposed,

At the end of the Question to add the words "and that the same rule shall be adopted on Wednesdays after a quarter to Six of the clock, and on other days, when the House meets at Two of the clock p.m., after ten minutes to Seven of the clock."—(Mr. Dillwyn.)

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER opposed the Amendment, on the ground that it would make the Rule unnecessarily strict.

MR. CHARLEY also opposed the Amendment.

Question put, "That those words be there added."

The House divided:—Ayes 185; Noes 23: Majority 162.

Resolved, That, except for a Money Bill, no Order of the Day or Notice of Motion be taken after half-past Twelve of the clock at night, with respect to which Order or Notice of Motion a Notice of Opposition or Amendment shall have been printed on the Notice Paper, or if such Notice of Motion shall only have been given the next previous day of sitting, and objection shall be taken when such Notice is called.

BEER LICENCES (IRELAND) BILL.

(Mr. Meldon, Mr. Charles Lewis, Mr. Whitworth.)

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. MELDON, in moving that the Bill be now read a second time, said, its object was to carry out in Ireland the provisions of the law with regard to beerhouses which applied to beerhouses in England. He would only mention that as the law stood at present in Ireland any kind of premises might be licensed for beerhouses, and, in point of fact, a large number of beerhouse licences had been granted to single rooms. There were many instances in Dublin where music licences were given to rooms occupied by families of eight, nine, or ten persons, and much of the crime of Dublin was traceable to those places. It was generally admitted that this system was a most monstrous one, and required change. He had attended a deputation to the Chief Secretary for Ireland from the licensed vintners of Dublin, of whom the Bill had the approval, as their trade was credited with drunkenness, much of which proceeded from these houses. He understood that the Chief Secretary for Ireland had expressed his assent to the principle of the Bill, which was that these licences should only be given to premises of a certain valuation. That was the old principle of the English law, which still remained in force. The Bill proposed that premises, to receive a beer licence, must have a rateable value of £10 in places with a population under 10,000 inhabitants, and of £20 if the population was over that limit. Those figures might, of course, be modified in Committee, but as the Bill was really unopposed he hoped it might be allowed to pass.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Meldon.)

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Debate be now adjourned."—(Mr. Eustace Smith.)

SIR MICHAEL HICKS - BEACH said, that so far as the Government was concerned, he should be glad if the House would consent to the second reading of the Bill. It was a small Bill, which affected the single question of the rateable value of the premises licensed as beershops, and, practically, it would apply only to the city of Dublin, there being hardly any such houses in other parts of Ireland. Obviously the provisions of the English law ought to be extended to Ireland in this respect, and he therefore expressed his assent to the Bill on the part of the Government. In Committee some modifications might be introduced into the Bill with advantage, and in particular he thought these houses should be subjected to the inspection of the police.

MR. GOLDSMID observed that the Bill was no doubt a good one, but it had been brought forward at a very bad time, since they were unable to discuss it at that hour.

MR. O'SULLIVAN supported the Bill. It was in Dublin that those night-houses and beerhouses were kept up, from which, and not from the regular licensed houses, much of the mischief proceeded from which the regular trade suffered. He thought it was a step in the right direction, whatever might be the effect of the unfortunate Bill of yesterday.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

THRESHING MACHINES BILL—[BILL 20.]

(Mr. Chaplin, Mr. Clare Read.)

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. CHAPLIN, in moving that the Bill be now read the second time, said, the object of the measure was to guard, as far as possible, against the occurrence of those lamentable accidents which too frequently happened in the working of machines of this nature. It contained but one clause. Several men were required in the working of these machines. One was employed in managing the machine and four others in assisting; but as there was not, as the machines were at present constructed, any safeguard at the feeding mouth, and the men being inexperienced, they were constantly exposed to serious accidents—accidents resulting in some cases in loss of life, and in others in permanent injuries. The Bill proposed to provide a safeguard at the feeding mouth, which would be of simple construction, and would have the effect, with care, of preventing such accidents; and it proposed to enforce the use of the guard by inflicting a penalty of 40s. on any person who permitted any such machine, belonging to him to be worked, or on any person in charge of such machine, without using this guard. Threshing machines when at work went at a rapid rate, making several hundred revolutions in a minute, and it was impossible in the absence of such means as the Bill provided to prevent accidents. The provisions of the measure were simple, and he trusted the House, in reference to the objects, would allow it to be read a second time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read the second time."—(Mr. Chaplin.)

MR. HAYTER said, it would be an improvement if they could introduce a provision imposing penalties upon persons who employed inexperienced men to attend and work these machines. It was not always easy to find competent persons to tend the machines, and the consequence was that deplorable accidents frequently occurred—one had recently taken place in his own neighbourhood. He should be very much pleased if the hon. Member could introduce a clause in the Bill providing that persons who were not competent should not be employed in the working of the machinery.

MR. SERJEANT SHERLOCK said, he did not rise to oppose the second reading of the Bill; on the contrary, he believed it to be a useful measure, and desired to urge on the hon. Member for Mid Lincolnshire, that it should be extended to Ireland. For in Ireland thrashing machines were in general use; the use of them was increasing, and accidents of a serious character unfortunately resulted too frequently from the use of the steam engine by which they were worked. And as this was a measure for the protection of the farm labourer, he hoped that the Irish farm servant would have the same measure of protection as his English brother. Considering that the object of the Bill was to enforce more care on the part of the proprietors of these engines, and more regard for the safety of the persons in their employment; he thought the maximum fine of 40s. too small a penalty for neglect which might, and often did, involve loss of life. The proprietors of these engines were in general men in comfortable, if not in wealthy, pecuniary circumstances, whilst the men injured were as a rule, poor men. It was true that as the law now stood if the owners of these engines were guilty of wilful and perverse negligence, they were liable either to a civil action or perhaps to a criminal prosecution; but neither proceeding was likely to result in much benefit to the poor farm servant or in the event of his death to his widow and children, he therefore suggested that it should be discretionary in the magistrates to increase the penalty to £5, which would more effectually carry out the object of the Bill.

GENERAL SIR GEORGE BALFOUR said, that if the measure was to apply to Ireland as well as to England, it might also be suitable for Scotland, and he would therefore request that the further progress of the Bill might be deferred until he had received letters from Scotland as to the wishes of the parties interested about the measure being extended to Scotland. He thought it should be made general to the United Kingdom, if deemed necessary for the protection of life and limb.

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON said, he completely concurred, on the part of the Government, in the objects of the Bill. The Bill was simple; and, in his opinion, did not go quite so far as might be desired; but no one acquainted with the agricultural population would deny the necessity of some measure of this kind. The accidents in 1875-1876 were numerous, and in some cases very serious—it was only a few days ago that a man had had his leg and thigh most seriously crushed. He should have thought that the owners of machines would for their own sakes employ skilled men to go out with the machines and direct the working of them; but if the case could be made out that incompetent persons were employed, he was sure his hon. Friend the Member for Mid Lincolnshire would allow Amendments to be introduced for the purpose of strengthening the measure. With regard to Ireland and Scotland, he should like to see the Bill extended to those countries.

MR. MITCHELL HENRY said, he thought there was great disadvantage in the extremely vague language in which the main clause of the Bill was couched. It set forth that the straps and wheels were to be kept securely fenced, so far as was reasonably practicable with the efficient working of the machine. Who, he asked, was to be the judge of what must be efficient and practicable working? The question would have to be left entirely to the discretion of magistrates. There were many agricultural machines which were extremely dangerous in their present condition. But he should like to ask whether the Law Officers of the Crown had really considered the scope and effect of the Bill; whether they thought a measure of this description should be further proceeded with, and whether it would not be better to introduce a much more comprehensive measure, such as that which affected manufacturing machines? This Bill seemed to him rather to limit than to extend the responsibility of those who were owners, or who were in charge of threshing machines. One magistrate, when a case was brought before him, might pooh-pooh the evidence, and say he considered the machine as well fenced as it could well be, while another magistrate might take a totally opposite view. To say that a machine should be fenced so far as was reasonable and practicable, "consistent with its efficient working," was not, in his opinion, language that would sufficiently accomplish the object of the hon. Member who had introduced the measure to the House.

MR. WHALLEY acknowledged the motives which led his hon. Friend (Mr. Chaplin) to introduce the Bill; but as it appeared to him the measure would create a new offence, he could not on that ground approve of it. He did not see that there was any necessity for this special legislation than there was for legislation with respect to any other kind of machinery. The Common Law of the country would be sufficient to meet and deal with all accidents arising from neglect, whether from threshing machines or otherwise. The Bill would establish a precedent to which there might be no end.

MR. GREENE said, he approved of the Bill generally, but he thought Amendments might be introduced in Committee. The Bill was extremely simple, and might prove the saving of many lives. As the machines were now used they proved the cause of many lamentable accidents and frequent loss of life; and he thought, therefore, the Bill would meet with the general acceptance of the House.

MR. YEAMAN, as a Scotch Member not unacquainted with the principles of threshing machines, said, he should give his support to the Bill. He heartily approved of its principle. They had legislation for the protection of manufacturing machinery in Scotland, such as in the linen and jute works, and that kind of machinery was far less dangerous than threshing machines. When they thought of the many careless people who were engaged to work these machines, it was surely their duty to legislate for their protection. He hoped the Bill would be made to apply to Scotland and Ireland. The expense of protecting the machines in the way proposed would be very small. He agreed that the penalty for not obeying the Act ought to be raised to £5.

MR. M'LAGAN said, he quite appreciated the motives which had actuated the hon. Member (Mr. Chaplin) in introducing the Bill, and he approved of any attempt to prevent these melancholy accidents; but he must say that, as the Bill had only been delivered that morning, he had scarcely had time to consider its principle. He should like to ask whether, in the opinion of the Government, the existing law was not sufficient to deal with these cases? For his own part, if it was, he should strongly object to multiplying offences and Acts of Parliament. If they began to legislate separately for one particular agricultural machine, there was no saying where they would stop. Why not legislate for turnip-crushing machines or steam ploughs? If they did that, they might soon have as many Acts referring to agricultural machines as they had agricultural machines themselves. He did not, however, intend to oppose the Bill.

MAJOR O'GORMAN congratulated the hon. Member on having brought in the Bill, and hoped he would consent to introduce a provision in it to extend it to Ireland. He hoped, however, that the penalty would be confined to 40s.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS, in reply to the question put to him by his hon. Friend (Mr. M'Lagan), said, no doubt the present law was sufficient to deal with these accidents; but the remedy was by civil action, and the process was expensive and dilatory, and poor persons interested were generally too poor to seek redress in that way. The law was therefore, in relation to such injuries, defective, and required amendment.

MR. CHAPLIN, in reply, said, that if any hon. Member liked to move in Committee that the Bill should extend to Scotland and Ireland, he should not object.

Motion agreed to.

IRISH CHURCH ACTS AMENDMENT BILL.—[BILL 48.]

(Mr. Parnell, Mr. Fay.)

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. PARNELL, in moving that the Bill be now read the second time, said, that its object was to facilitate the purchase by the occupying tenants of the lands which formerly belonged to the Irish Church, and which were now vested in the Irish Church Temporalities Commissioners. In the first place, he would call the attention of the House to those sections of the Irish Church Act of 1869 which his Bill proposed to amend. That Act, as the House was no doubt aware, vested the landed and other property of the former Established Church of Ireland in the hands of the Church Temporalities Commissioners. One of the sections—the 34th—empowered the Commissioners to sell the fee-simple of lands held of them, a right of pre-emption being given to the occupying tenant—thus clearly indicating that the tenants should be encouraged to purchase their holdings in order that a class of peasant proprietors might be created. Section 52 empowered the Commissioners to credit the purchaser with three-fourths of the purchase money on the payment of 25 per cent in cash, the payment of the remaining three-fourths being spread over a term of 32 years, in half-yearly instalments, with interest at the rate of 4 per cent on the unpaid portion. The Commissioners were also empowered by Section 32 to sell any rent-charge in lieu of tithes to the owners of the land charged therewith for a sum equal to 22½ times the amount of such rent-charge, and they could declare the purchase money so payable by the owner or any part thereof to be payable by instalments, extending over 52 years, of £4 9s. per cent on the purchase money. Now, he proposed by this Bill to place the tenant, purchasing the fee-simple of the land, upon the same footing with the purchaser of the tithe rent-charge—that was to say, that the purchase money payable by the tenants of the land when purchasing the fee-simple of their holdings from the Commissioners might be payable by instalments extending over 52 years of £4 9s. per cent per annum on the purchase money, thus placing the tenant of Church lands desirous of purchasing the fee-simple of his holding in the same position as the owners of land charged with rent-charge desirous of purchasing the charge on their land; with this exception, that whereas the Act of 1869 fixed the purchase price of the tithe rent-charge at 22½ years' purchase, this Bill provided that the purchase price of the fee-simple might vary from 20 to 25 years' purchase of the general tenement valuation. The reason for this was obvious. The tithe rent-charge was a first charge on the land, and as it had a very large margin of security, it bore a higher market value than the fee-simple of the land, which came after it, and therefore it had been thought proper by the framers of the Bill that the price of the holding to the tenant should be somewhat less than the price paid by the landlord for purchasing the tithe rent-charge; though in some cases it might be more. He wished to draw attention to the difference under the present law between the position of a tenant who was desirous of purchasing his holding and that of the owner of the land subject to the tithe rent-charge. The tenant was only permitted to purchase his holding by paying one-fourth of the purchase money in cash and the remainder by instalments bearing interest at 4 per cent per annum; whereas the owner of land charged with rent-charge, who was usually a wealthy landlord, could purchase the rent-charge without paying any cash, and both interest and sinking fund were provided for by an annual payment of less than 4½ per cent per annum. What, then, he proposed was that the tenants should be allowed to purchase their holdings on the same footing as the purchasers of tithe rent-charge—namely, that they should not be required to pay one-fourth, but that the whole should be payable by instalments distributed over a period of 52 years. It appeared from the last Report of the Commissioners of the Irish Church Temporalities that the great bulk of the land held by them had been offered for sale to the tenants, and that some comparatively small sales of these lands had been effected in the Landed Estates Court. During the past year 2,770 offers of sales had been made: of these, 1,470 had been accepted, 400 had been declined, and 900 cases were still pending, and in the case of 500 holdings no offers had been made. There were therefore some 1,800 holdings to which this Bill, if carried, would be applicable. The Commissioners further stated that when they first commenced to offer the Church lands for sale the tenants were not generally prepared to take advantage of the offer, few of them being aware of the privileges conferred on them by the Act, while, as a class, they were poor and ignorant, and misunderstood the offers made to them; but they said there was no doubt that the agricultural tenants were almost universally anxious to purchase their farms, and would do so if they had the means, and that many of the tenants who had been unable to buy, or who had misunderstood the offer of sale when it was first made, would now be glad to purchase. It was, therefore, not without confidence that he asked the House to read a second time a Bill which would promote the prosperity, contentment, and independence of some 1,800 industrious heads of families in Ireland. The hon. Gentleman concluded by moving the second reading of the Bill.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read the second time."—(Mr. Parnell.)

MR. MACARTNEY said, he should oppose the Bill and move its rejection, on the ground that it was not retrospective, and would therefore give to those who now purchased under it a great advantage over those tenants who had already purchased their holdings under the existing terms of the Act and had paid down 25 per cent of their purchase money. Many of these holdings had been purchased at prices varying from 30 to 15 or 12 years' purchase, according to the circumstances of the holding; and that price was sometimes 30 or 40 per cent more than the purchasers under the present Bill would be required to pay, without the obligation of paying any part of price down. This would operate very unjustly on those who had already purchased under the provisions of the existing laws; and would they not be entitled to demand from the country a reduction of the terms on which they had themselves purchased, to a proportion similar to that which was to be extended towards purchasers under the provisions of the Bill now before the House? The measure would revolutionize and disturb all the money arrangements of Ireland with regard to land purchased from the Commissioners. He should therefore oppose the second reading.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day six months."—(Mr. Macartney.)

MR. FAY said, he contested the statement of the hon. Member for Tyrone that any disturbance would arise in the arrangements with past purchasers out of the present Bill. The Government had, through the Church Temporalities Commissioners, given the tenants the opportunity of acquiring the lands they held; but the conditions required by the Commissioners were so stringent that the poorer class of tenants were unable to meet them. He thought the spirit of the intention should be carried out, and those who were unable to pay the fourth down should be assisted, so that they should be enabled to seize the opportunity. He could state, as a matter of fact, that within a few days he had seen conveyances from the Church Commissioners to tenants; but the latter being unable to raise the money to be paid down had gone to gentlemen of their neighbourhood and asked them to purchase the property and become their landlords. In this way the poorer tenants were unable to take the benefits the Act intended for them, and many of the small holdings had been lost to the occupiers. He could not help expressing his regret that the Irish Church Commissioners when they found the tenants were so poor did not report to the House upon the circumstances, so that something could have been done. But there remained some tenants who had not been transferred to other owners, and for these he hoped the opportunity afforded in the Bill would not be lost by a hard-and-fast line of 20 or 25 years in the price of land on the terms as to the occupier as to those others who had purchased the tithe rent-charge. He thought that if the Bill were allowed to go into Committee hon. Members who supported it might be inclined to make such concessions as would meet all fair objections on the other side.

MR. O'SHAUGHNESSY said, the Bill consisted mainly of two parts; in the first place it compelled the Commissioners to accept occupiers of holdings of 25 years' purchase; and, secondly, it gave facilities for purchase by spreading the payment of the purchase money over a considerable time instead of laying a large sum down. The provisions of the Bill in these respects were in keeping with the spirit of the Land Act. The object of that measure as of this was to enable tenants to acquire the fee-simple of the land. It was not necessary to dwell on the advantages the measure would confer on the country—long experience and the history of agriculture sufficiently demonstrated that. The present proposal raised no "burning question" of landlord and tenant right—it proposed not to trench upon the landlord's rights, or to "confiscate" his property—it was the opportunity for the Government to confer a sound benefit upon the tenant class without touching the landlord interest. He regretted, and he could not understand, the determined opposition which had been offered to the Bill on the part of the landlord interest, because no fraction of the privileges of the latter was interfered with.

MR. ARCHDALL said, he should be happy to give the Bill his support, believing it to be a fair and a just one.

MR. WHALLEY desired to call the attention of the House to the fact that the property which Parliament was thus asked to deal with was public property, and that the concession asked was in favour of the poor Irish tenant—concessions the House had made for many years to the Irish tenant, and he hoped would continue to make. For 25 years their claims, if not always granted, had been frequently recognized, and this was a case where the property to be dealt with was not private but public property.

MR. MULHOLLAND pointed out that although its supporters had argued that the Bill would carry out the principle of the Land Act he differed from them emphatically, and cited the words used by Mr. Gladstone in support of his views that before the State should lend money to the tenants for the purchase of their holdings, 25 per cent of the purchase money should be paid down. It was not to be supposed that (owing to bad seasons and from other causes) the payments extending over 52 years would not often fall into arrears, and it was now proposed that the occupier should become a nominal owner without having paid a shilling. It was, in his opinion, a most unsafe investment of the Irish Church surplus, and it was entirely against the spirit of the Irish Church Act. Quoting from a speech made by Mr. Gladstone on the occasion of bringing in that Act, the hon. Member proceeded to show that on national grounds, and for national interests, the Church Act fixed the terms of purchase of the tithe rent-charge, and not with any view of favouring particular tenants. There were urgent reasons why the House should not pass the Bill without very strictly investigating the consequences which it involved. The Bill was dangerous in every way—it would endanger the surplus accruing to the State from the Church funds; it would place the State in a very anomalous position in regard to those who had already purchased under the Irish Church Act; and, moreover, it would establish a very bad precedent. He should be very glad to see tenants obtain possession of their holdings—nothing could be more conservative and more beneficial to Ireland—but this should be done on reasonable terms and by carrying out reasonable arrangements, and it was not a reasonable arrangement that the tenant should be free from all responsibility—he ought to be made to pay down some portion of the purchase money as a guarantee of his good faith and to afford security for the State, which lent him the capital. If this Bill were passed, he did not see how they could refuse to re-model the Bright Clauses of the Land Act in the same direction as this Bill. But Mr. Bright had expressly declared his satisfaction with those clauses, and as that opinion did not emanate from a Conservative Member or an Irish landlord, he thought hon. Members opposite would receive his testimony with some respect. Five thousand tenants had already purchased their holdings from the Church Temporalities Commissioners, and a section of this Bill provided that if any of those tenants thought he had paid too much for his tenement, he might apply for an arbitration on the question whether he had paid too much. If the arbitrator should decide in the affirmative, the excess must be returned; and it would have to be returned out of a surplus which Parliament devoted to a national trust. He hoped the House would reject a Bill which raised very important issues in so hasty and inconsiderate a manner.

MR. BENETT STANFORD said, he was unable to agree with the objections which had been raised. Generally he was averse to treating measures coming from any particular part of the United Kingdom in any other light than that of Imperial measures; but when on this subject he found an almost unanimous opinion amongst the Irish Members that the Bill would be for the advantage of their country, then that appeared to him to be a strong reason why he should vote for the second reading. The broad principle which guided him was whether the measure would effect good or evil for Ireland. He had read the Bill, and he found that it must increase the number of small freeholders in Ireland, and that to his belief would tend to add to the prosperity of the country. That opinion was confirmed by the almost unanimous support which was accorded to it by the Members for Ireland, and he should therefore cordially support the second reading.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH said, he had every sympathy with the feeling of the House in favour of extending as far as possible the opportunities for tenants in Ireland becoming owners. But it was for the House to consider not only the natural desire in favour of that extension, but also the means by which it was proposed to carry it out. The hon. Member for Meath (Mr. Parnell) had spoken of the Bill as a short and simple one for extending to tenants under the Church Temporalities Commissioners the facilities for purchasing lands in their occupation which were given to the owners of land liable to tithe rent-charges under the Act of 1869 for redeeming the tithe rent-charge. For himself, he could have wished that the Bill had not come on for consideration before the Report of the Commissioners for last year had been presented; because he thought that it would show a result different from the Report for 1875. The hon. Member for Cavan (Mr. Fay) had quoted the Report of 1875 to show that the Commissioners had done very little in the way of carrying out the intention of the Land Act, which was that the tenants of Church lands should, as far as possible, become owners in fee-simple. He (Sir Michael Hicks-Beach) thought from what he had learnt that there was good reason to suppose the Report for last year, which would be presented in a few days, would show very considerable improvement in that respect, and also considerable progress in the sale of Church lands. Under the provisions of the Irish Church Act of 1869, amended by that of 1872, landowners were permitted to purchase the tithe rent-charge on their lands at a capital sum calculated at 22½ years purchase, payable in 52 years by annual instalments of £4 9s. per cent. In making the calculation of the capital value of the tithe rent-charge they were to deduct any poor rate paid on it; and provision was made by which the owners of tithe rent-charge who had purchased the rent-charge without receiving any allowance for poor rates, were permitted to go so far back on their bargain as to deduct the poor rate from the sum they had paid. Those were the provisions which the hon. Member proposed to extend to the tenants of Church lands. Now, speaking for himself, he could not say he approved the provisions of the Act of 1869 with regard to the purchase of tithe rent-charge. It seemed to him as it did to some other Members of the House—the hon. Member for Hackney (Mr. Fawcett) spoke strongly on the subject at the time—that it might be considered as giving something like a bribe to the landlords. The hon. Member for Downpatrick had stated the reasons which induced Parliament to assent to that course; and he was bound to say that these reasons were so far justified by the event that the bribe had not proved sufficiently tempting to induce a large number of the payers of tithe rent-charge to redeem it. But who were the tenants of Church lands to whom it was now proposed to give the fee-simple of their farms in return for an annual payment for 52 years, which would, in any case, be but little greater than the rent which they now paid as tenants? The hon. Gentleman (Mr. Parnell) did not define them in the Bill. Were they the tenants who held leases and sublet to others? or were they the occupying tenants? [Mr. PARNELL: The occupying tenants.] Then, were there any provisions in the Bill to prevent those who had perhaps only a few months ago become tenants for the first time under the Church Commissioners from receiving a boon not conferred upon anyone outside the class, and which there was no reason why they should enjoy more than anyone else? If not, the omission was a great blot. But this scheme did not carry out the policy of the 37th section of the Church Act; that might have been satisfied by taking 22½ years purchase of the real annual value of the land, possibly even of the rental paid by the tenant; but it took as the test of value the tenement valuation which notoriously was not a test of value, and thus went much beyond the Church Act. Why should they? The hon. Member who proposed the Bill had himself stated the reason; because otherwise there could be no real security for the repayment of the purchase money. In the case of the tithe rent-charge there was an ample security, because that being a first charge on the property amounted to only 1s. in the pound on its annual value, and therefore there was a large margin to secure the annual payment over 52 years; but if that annual payment represented the real annual value of the property plus a small increase, you would have a charge on the land for 52 years which was greater than the rent now paid by the tenant. What security had they for the payment during that 52 years? To avoid this the hon. Member for Cavan proposed to keep down the annual repayments by under-estimating the real value of the land, and thus to sell the land to the tenants for an amount which, even with the almost nominal addition for the redemption of the capital would be less than the rent they were now paying. Why should a large portion of the "Church surplus" be thus handed over to these tenants? But if this were not done had not the Commissioners a worse security than they had for the payment of the present rental? In many cases these tenants were persons of small capital, having very small farms, liable in the event of one or two bad seasons to fall into arrears of rent, and then if they did so the Commissioners would be placed in this position—they would feel themselves the landlords of a considerable portion of the country—they would be the landlords of tenants falling into arrears practically irrecoverable by a body like the Church Commissioners, or if attempts were made to recover them, they would become the source of no end of bitterness and heart-burning. That was the difficulty. You would place the Commissioners in an invidious and improper position without giving them the security which any private seller of an estate would demand. What was the present law? A tenant might now buy his holding at its estimated value, paying one-fourth of the purchase money down and the rest by instalments extending over 32 years, with interest at 4 per cent; and for this purpose he could borrow from Government two-thirds of the purchase money, repaying it by an annuity of 5 per cent per annum for 35 years. He (Sir Michael Hicks-Beach) could not see how more favourable terms could be given to the tenants than these. He now came to that part of the Bill not intended, according to the hon. Member for Cavan, to be pressed—he meant the retrospective clauses. The hon. Member had practically copied Clauses 3, 5, 6 and 7 of his Bill from the Act of 1872; but he had added to them Clause 4, providing for a reference to arbitration, which in the Act of 1872 referred not to sales of tithe rent-charge by the Commissioners, but to purchasers by them of tithe rent-charge from lessees. He was willing now to give up the retrospective part of the Bill; but he desired to point out to the hon. Member that it was impossible to adopt a scheme of this kind without doing the grossest injustice to the 5,000 or 6,000 persons who had purchased Church lands under the existing law. It seemed to him that this Bill, taken as a whole, was one which ought not to receive the sanction of the House. His objections to it were, putting aside the question of the introduction of tenement valuation, purely of a financial character. Last year the hon. Member for Cavan introduced a measure which he (Sir Michael Hicks-Beach) believed to be identical with this Bill. He referred it to the Church Temporalities Commissioners. He obtained from them at the time a Report which dealt very fully with the scheme. He had not had time to refer again to the Church Temporalities Commissioners. He could not tell what progress had been made in the interval, and therefore it was difficult for him to judge what necessity there might be for any change of the present law. He thought that so far as it could be done consistently with obtaining upon proper security a fair price for the land, to which the State was entitled, facilities should be given to the tenants to purchase their farms. Whether the payment might be spread over a greater number of years than at present he could not say; but if the hon. Member would not press this measure, which he (Sir Michael Hicks-Beach) thought was open to great objection, he would at once consult the Church Temporalities Commissioners, and if necessary would prepare a measure for the improvement of the present law.

MR. BUTT said, he thought that what the right hon. Baronet the Chief Secretary had said afforded a very good reason for reading the Bill a second time, and deferring its further consideration until he had obtained the information which he had promised to procure. From what they had heard he was prepared to vote for the second reading of the Bill; the view he took of it being this—he was not concerned with the policy of dealing with the Church or the Land Acts—as he understood the principle of the present Bill, it dealt exclusively with the occupying tenant of Church lands. Those tenants had in many cases come into their holdings under the Protestant clergymen, whose character was in general a guarantee that no tenant would be dealt with harshly; but now those tenants might be transferred with the land to a purchaser who might be a speculator in land, and who would deal with them as hardly as any secular proprietor. Could the House, under those circumstances, do anything for those tenants? It had been supposed by some that something might be done in the Landed Estates Court to protect those tenants against excessive rent. But that might be considered an interference with the rights of property. But there could be no interference with the rights of property in the propositions of the present Bill. There might be a diminution of the surplus Fund of £5,000,000 or £6,000,000 under the Irish Church Act; but, if so, no one would be injured.

Even if that surplus would be diminished the only consequence would be that there would be less to devote to the Irish purposes to which it was to be appropriated; and, for his own part, he did not know of any better Irish purpose to which it could be appropriated than the purpose to which it would be devoted by this Bill. This, he believed, was the principle of the Bill. They were not now asked to start any new principle, for the principle of the Bill was recognized by the Church Act, which admitted that something must be done for these persons. He thought it would be an enormous advantage to establish a small class of landed proprietors, for which this Bill gave an opportunity, without trenching upon right of property in any way, and that being so, the question arose whether they should take advantage of it. He must say, for his own part, that he thought they should not allow the chance to pass of effecting an object which he thought would be generally felt was one of great importance, and the attainment of which was likely to be of great public advantage, besides that which it would confer upon a class of persons deserving their sympathy. He quite admitted that the present valuation did not afford a fair test of the value of the land; but he thought the poor tenant should gain the same benefit as the rich landlord from the Church Temporalities Act. The hon. Member for Downpatrick (Mr. Mulholland) had expressed a fear that the passage of this Bill would endanger the security for the charge of the Irish Church; but the surplus was sufficiently large to leave an ample margin of security for the Irish Church charge after this Bill had been passed. He would ask them where there was anything unreasonable in the Bill? If, without trenching on the rights of property, they should embrace the only opportunity which might be afforded for a century in the way of establishing a peasant proprietary, he said then, in Heaven's name, let them embrace that opportunity by passing the second reading, even if they were to defer further progress with it until they had obtained such further information as might be requisite to settle its details. He trusted that by affirming the second reading of the Bill they would take a step which would do justice to a poor class of tenants by giving them every possible facility of purchasing their interests.

MR. O'REILLY said, he thought there was so little difference between the views of the Chief Secretary for Ireland and those of the supporters of the Bill, that he did not see why they should go to a division. Both were agreed that the object of the Bill was a very desirable one—namely, to give to the occupying tenants the same facilities of purchasing their holdings which was given to the landlord for purchasing the tithe rent-charge. The promoters of the Bill were willing to give up the retrospective clause, and also to let the price be fixed on the basis of the rent instead of by the tenements' valuation, in order to meet the objections which had been taken, provided the principle was accepted of waiving the immediate payment of one-fourth of the purchase money—a stipulation which was too onerous for the poorer class of tenants who wished to acquire their holdings. The Chief Secretary asked what security the Commissioners would have for the punctual payment of the instalments by the occupier? But he believed that the tenant would make every effort to keep up his annual payments when he had a yearly increasing interest at stake, and knew that if he fell into arrears he would be liable to forfeit the part of the purchase money he had already paid. If such an understanding were come to there would probably be no doubt that under these circumstances the Irish tenants would keep up their payments. If they were not to press the second reading of the Bill the Government should at least give an engagement that the case of existing tenants should not suffer by any delay in dealing with the subject.

MR. CHARLES LEWIS said, he would challenge anyone to say that this was a question between rival Churches, or that it involved any point of protecting the poorer tenant against the oppression of landlords—it was simply a dry commercial question as to how that which had become public property should best be converted into money, and what conditions should be annexed to that process. Only a few years ago the Irish Church was disestablished amid a burst of political enthusiasm, and why were they now asked so early to alter the provisions of that measure?

Much had been said about the poor tenants. Some of the Church tenants might be poor, but he believed that they were frequently rich persons, who were well able to take care of themselves. He denied that because the holding might be small the tenant must be poor—he said that many of them could, if they chose, easily pay down the quarter of the purchase money required by the Act of Parliament. But whether rich or poor, he objected to allowing that consideration to affect the terms upon which public property should be converted by sale into private property. The sole consideration was how the public interests were to be protected in the question. Moreover, a difference could not be made between rich and poor in applying the provisions of the statute. This was essentially a Bill of details, and yet almost every clause in it had been surrendered by its supporters. There was no principle in the measure, though there was a sort of sentiment underlying it. It might be desirable that tenants should become owners of their holdings, but the existing terms under which they could do that now were fair and reasonable; and the present Bill sought to substitute terms that were improvident and unreasonable. It was urged that they had already done for the rich landlord what they were now asked to do for the poor tenant, but he denied that the two cases were analogous; for in the instance of the tithe-owner they had the security of the estate itself for the small payments; whereas by this Bill it was proposed to give the tenant credit for the whole purchase money of the fee-simple. He should certainly oppose the second reading of the Bill.

MR. MITCHELL HENRY said, the hon. and learned Member for Londonderry (Mr. Charles Lewis) could evidently speak as fluently on a subject that he did not understand as on one that he had studied, and certainly could apply general principles in a manner somewhat misleading. If the hon. and learned Gentleman had read the Report of the Church Temporalities Commissioners he would have seen that they desired that some measure of the kind should be initiated either through Parliament or through themselves. The facts were in the smallest possible compass. To about 9,000 holders under the Church, facilities were given for the purchase of their tithe rent-charge. Of these one-half who were chiefly landlords had already purchased under considerable facilities; but the smaller class of tenants, though the hon. and learned Member for Londonderry thought they could pay one-fourth of the purchase money, were not able to partake of the advantages offered to their richer neighbours, the landlords. The Commissioners said that if the intentions of Parliament were to be carried out additional facilities must be given to smaller holders. That being the case, the simple question was whether the Bill went too far in giving these facilities, or whether this desirable object should be carried out in some other way. The hon. and learned Member for Londonderry had introduced into this question an exciting topic when he put it as a matter between the Church of Ireland and the tenant, and by so doing he was introducing a very mischievous question, which certainly was never intended to be introduced by this Bill, and had not been raised on his side of the House. For his own part, he wished to suggest to the right hon. Gentleman who represented the Irish Government on this occasion that if he would consent to the second reading of the Bill it would be the duty of the House to refer it to a Select Committee, with the view of obtaining the views of the Commissioners of Church Temporalities on it.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. PLUNKET) said, it was desirable to clear away some misunderstandings that had arisen in the course of the debate. It had been said that this was no question of the Disestablishment of the Church, but that the Bill was introduced simply in the interest of the public generally—that it was intended to provide facilities for enabling the tenants to purchase their holdings. He (the Solicitor General) agreed that this was no question injurious to the interests of the Disestablished Church or affecting the policy of a new Land Act—nobody had said that it was—but he did say that it was a question of conferring on certain persons a very considerable advantage which could not be shared by the general public. He said further that while it was true that the Irish Church Commissioners had intimated in their Report that they thought something should be done to amend the law in relation to that subject, yet they having had a Bill like the present one under their consideration, they did not deem it either a wise or a desirable method of attaining their end. After further consultation with the Commissioners, however, the Government would be ready to consider whether some reasonable measure could not be introduced to facilitate the purchase of their holdings by the tenants. The aggregate annual rental derived from 6,000 tenants was £135,000, or an average of over £27 a-year from each. It was not true, therefore, that the tenants interested in this question were very poor. Moreover, this Bill dealt with the immediate lessees, and not with the occupying tenants. But there was one principle in the Bill which compelled him to decline voting for the second reading. It proposed that the Commissioners who held this property in trust for the public should sell the fee-simple of the land to the tenants who were not to lay down a single farthing of purchase money. It must be known to many hon. Members that that would be a total departure from the principle of any Bill or any Act that had yet become law. This was the cardinal principle of the Bill; and as the Government could not sanction it they could not support the second reading.

SALE OF INTOXICATING LIQUORS ON SUNDAY BILL.

LEAVE. FIRST READING.

MR. WILSON, according to Notice, moved for leave to bring in a Bill to prohibit the Sale of Intoxicating Liquors on Sunday in England and Wales.

MR. ASSHETON said, that he had no intention of offering any opposition to the introduction of this Bill. He certainly would not attempt to discuss a measure which was not in the hands of Members; but while it was still in a plastic state he wished to call the attention of the hon. Member who had introduced it (Mr. C. Wilson) to the inaccurate description which had been given of all Bills of this kind which he had ever seen. The object of this Bill, they were told, was to prohibit the sale of intoxicating liquors on Sunday in England and Wales. Of course he could not tell what the provisions of this measure might be; but in all similar Bills which they had discussed in that House there were clauses which exempted travellers—bond fide travellers—and lodgers from the action of the Bill. These Bills closed the public-houses to those who lived to the immediate neighbourhood, but not to those who lived far off. He ventured to say that many Members of this House, and certainly nine out of ten who signed Petitions in favour of Sunday closing, thought that they were advocating a system of closing public-houses in such a way that liquor could not be bought on Sunday any more than they could buy a coat or a hat. That was a distinct and intelligible issue. There was much to be said for it and against it; but it would clear the ground very much if that issue were distinctly raised, and if the hon. Member would bring in a Bill in reality for preventing the sale of intoxicating liquors on Sunday, and not a Bill which really meant something very different. Up to the present time, in discussing these Bills, they had been talking of one thing and endeavouring to do another. He should not offer any opinion upon the merits of the Bill, but he should like to see that issue brought plainly before the House and the country.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said, the hon. Member for Clitheroe (Mr. Assheton) seemed to have forgotten altogether the experience of this country in dealing with the Sunday closing of public-houses. He wished not only to close the public-houses as the Bill proposed to close them, but he wished to go further and exclude even the bond fide traveller from obtaining refreshment. The hon. Member must have been singularly unobservant of the history of this question if he was not aware that legislation similar to that which he proposed had produced rioting throughout the length and breadth of this country, and had to be repealed within a year, and he (Sir Charles W. Dilke) was confident that a similar result would ensue if the Bill of the hon. Member for Hull should become law, even in a modified form. He (Sir Charles W. Dilke) did not believe that the Bill would receive the assent of the House for the reason he had given; and the proposal of the hon. Member for Clitheroe (Mr. Assheton) would be opposed to the good sense of that House and the wishes of the country, and would certainly lead to the consequences he had described. In 1854 it was proposed to close beerhouses and public-houses during more hours of the day than they had been closed up to that time; and when that proposal went before the country—a proposal for which the opinion of the country was not prepared—there was serious rioting in London and other towns in England, and that legislation was altered within a year from the time it was passed. Mr. Wilson-Patten brought in that Bill; it had the general assent of the House; and yet in 1855—only a year after it was passed—the change of hours had to be put back again almost as before, and Parliament presented the humiliating spectacle of having to undo in the greatest haste what it had done only a year before. He knew it had become a custom not to oppose the introduction of Bills, and he supposed that Members were not prepared to vote against their introduction; but certainly he believed there would be a very strong case for opposing the introduction of the present measure. It did not seem to him, when they knew what the measure was just as well as if it were actually in their hands, that there was any good reason why they should not discuss it and decide upon it at once, instead of allowing it to remain a long time upon the Order Book, and then to discuss it. But if that course were not taken upon the present occasion he thought it would be wise to adopt it in future years, not in regard to this Bill alone, but in regard to many of a similar character. The discussion might just as well take place on the first reading as months afterwards, when the Bill came up for second reading.

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON said, he quite agreed with what had fallen from the hon. Baronet the Member for Chelsea (Sir Charles W. Dilke), that it might be a wise course on the part of this House to adopt to oppose in future Sessions the first reading of Bills of this kind, which on their face enunciated principles which—even if the House were to pass them—it would be practically impossible or unwise to carry out. But that would not be in accordance with the custom which had recently, within the last few years, crept into the Business of that House, of always allowing a Bill to be introduced and read a first time as a matter of course. That was not, he believed, always the best course. At the same time, he did not feel disposed to oppose the first reading of a Bill of this kind after the Session had begun; because, to his mind, there were many other Bills equally open to the objections which might be taken to this which had already been allowed to be introduced to that House without opposition. For that reason he should not offer any opposition to the introduction of the Bill, however much he was opposed to the principle upon which he imagined it to be based. But he thought the course suggested by the hon. Baronet would be a wise course for that House to adopt on a future occasion, and to come to some resolution that they would allow a Bill which was proposed, and the principle of which the House was not in favour of, being opposed on its first reading.

MR. LOCKE said, he was very sorry to hear what had fallen from the hon. Baronet opposite (Sir Henry Selwin-Ibbetson), who gave strong reasons why this Bill should not be thought of for an instant, and yet said he was desirous of listening to another debate upon it. [SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON: I did not say that.] Well, at any rate, that was the purport of his remarks. Although the hon. Baronet objected to it entirely—and not merely this Bill, but a great many others that had been brought forward—yet he thought they ought to be introduced, or, at any rate, not opposed on their first reading. Now, he (Mr. Locke) could not understand at all why this Bill should be allowed to be brought forward. It seemed to him the most ridiculous thing possible. He was sure that the hon. Gentleman—he did not exactly know who he was—who brought forward the Bill must be aware that on a former occasion a Bill was introduced to take away, he thought, only one hour from the time during which on Sundays people might drink some beer if they chose. Now, what was the consequence? That Bill was referred to a

Sir Charles W. Dilke

Committee, and he had the honour of being upon it. The subject was thoroughly inquired into, an immense deal of evidence was taken—he forgot how many weeks or months it extended over—but what was the result they arrived at? It was decided that the Bill should be entirely thrown out, and that not even five minutes' alteration should take place. That was with reference to England; and, therefore, why was it to be supposed that at the present time, when a question of this sort was raised, there should be any difference of opinion to that which previously prevailed? It was extremely inconvenient that these questions should be re-opened year after year. His hon. Friend the Member for Carlisle (Sir Wilfrid Lawson) brought forward his Bill year after year as soon as the House met; but the principle involved in that measure was not half so absurd as that which was now proposed, inasmuch as if a certain majority of persons in a particular district chose to say they would have no drink, it would give them the option of carrying out their wishes. But the present Bill was to this effect—that this House was to come to the determination that no person whatever throughout this land should have the opportunity of having anything to drink on Sunday. He was quite satisfied, and he was sure the great majority of those he was addressing would be of the same opinion, that such a law as that could not be desired by any reasonable person in this country. He really could not understand why, when it was admitted that almost everybody was decidedly opposed to the Bill, it was considered that it ought not to be thrown out on the first reading. It was not necessary for him to do more than say he should oppose the Bill—at least, it was not a Bill yet—and he sincerely hoped everybody else would do the same.

MR. RICHARD SMYTH desired to remind the hon. and learned Member who had just spoken that when a cognate measure, not now unpopular, was before the House with reference to the sister country the hon. Gentlemen who were opposed to that measure had taken every opportunity of voting against it, and he had not the slightest doubt that if they could have effected the object now sought to be enforced of a division on the first reading, it would never have reached its present stage. That Bill was carried on the second reading, because of the discussions which took place upon it in that House. He did not know much of the merits of the Bill now proposed to be introduced, but he thought it would be an extraordinary proceeding if they were prevented from discussing its merits. It might be that, although the second reading might not be carried this year or next, if discussions took place upon it, public opinion would be formed on the subject, and eventually the Bill might become law. The hon. and learned Member for Southwark had spoken of the Committee which sat on this question some years ago, but he seemed to forget that public opinion had made great advances during the intervening period, and it was not to be assumed that because certain antediluvian Committees threw out a similar measure a more modern Assembly would do the same. He trusted the House would extend the usual courtesy to his hon. Friend, and allow him to introduce the Bill.

SIR ANDREW LUSK said, it was always understood that, as a matter of courtesy, when a Member sought to bring in a Bill, he should be permitted to have it read a first time. At present he could not decide for or against the Bill proposed by the hon. Member for Hull. He thought the intentions of the hon. Member were good; and as none of them at present knew what the Bill was to be like, it would be only kind, fair, and according to the rules and custom of that House, that he should be permitted to introduce it. The question whether the rule with regard to the introduction of Bills, which had been in existence a long time, should be altered was a fair subject for discussion, but he hoped it would not be put to the test on this occasion, as it would be a little hard on a private Member.

MR. BERESFORD HOPE said, he believed that, though he was junior in years to the hon. Baronet who had just preceded him, he was his senior as a Member of the House, and he must accordingly explain that in the earlier days of his Parliamentary experience the custom of the House of Commons in regard to the Bills of private Members had been directly contrary to what had been just stated. At the period to which he referred it was a usual and well-understood practice to take a debate on the introduction of a Bill. In those days the Member who brought in a measure made himself acquainted with his own brief. He did not bring in a dummy Bill, and wait to find out how other Members wanted to have it filled up, but in offering his measure he gave a statement as to what he intended it to effect. A discussion ensued, and a division might afterwards be taken. A contrary custom had, however, grown up since then to a considerable extent; but [still it was a custom which had many exceptions. He remembered, for instance, of being himself instrumental in the House a few years ago in relieving Mr. Auberon Herbert from the trouble of taking further steps in connection with a Bill which he desired to bring in. It would, he was sure, tend very much to shorten the Session and to make their proceedings really beneficial if they were to revert to the old practice. There was only one fact which it was necessary to mention in order to show to what extent of complication the present system had led the House. That day was the 14th of February, and the Wednesday list was filled up to the 25th of July. That fact alone should surely be quite sufficient to induce the House not to be so kind-hearted as the hon. Member opposite (Sir Andrew Lusk) desired, but to consider their own time and the relative value of the respective measures.

MR. KNATCHBULL - HUGESSEN had always opposed these restrictions, and could hold out to his hon. Friend no hope of support upon the second reading. But he felt bound to say that he could not join in opposing the introduction of the Bill. He believed the question had not been discussed during the present Parliament; it was one upon which many persons felt strongly, and it would be an act of discourtesy to his hon. Friend, representing as he did a large constituency and desiring to ventilate this important question, if they should refuse him the opportunity of doing so. In the other House of Parliament Bills were introduced as a matter of right, and he did not see why Members of the House of Commons should not, within due bounds, be allowed a similar right.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS said, the statement which had been made by the hon. Member for the University of

Cambridge (Mr. Beresford Hope), that the practice of the House in former years in connection with the introduction of Bills had been different from what it was at present, was undoubtedly correct; and it might be a matter for discussion whether it might not be desirable for the House in another Session to revert to the old practice. His own opinion was that a great many Bills were brought in which had not the slightest chance of becoming law, but which, nevertheless, took up a great deal of time, and whether they ought not to revert to the old practice might be a very fair subject for discussion. This Session pretty nearly 100 Bills had been brought in by private Members, and that perhaps might show the necessity of exercising some discretion in bringing measures forward. But he thought it would be somewhat discourteous, without the slightest notice, to pick this particular Bill out from the 100, and say that it should not be read the first time. There was another reason why the House should object to the course proposed by the hon. Gentleman opposite. He was quite sure that, under the existing circumstances of this being an isolated Bill, picked out for this purpose, a division would not give anything like a general expression of the opinion of the House on the merits of the case. It would probably give an expression of opinion quite the reverse of the feeling of the House as to the merits of the Bill, which would be misleading out of doors. He, for one, should certainly oppose the Bill on its second reading, for reasons which he hoped he should be able to show to the satisfaction of the House. He hoped, therefore, that the Motion would not be pressed, and, at the same time, he hoped the House would take into consideration whether it would not be wise in future to revert to the old practice.

MR. ASSHETON asked to be allowed to explain a misapprehension under which the hon. Baronet the Member for Chelsea (Sir Charles Dilke), and other hon. Members seemed to be labouring. He had guarded himself expressly against giving any opinion for or against Sunday closing. He merely wished to see the question clearly and distinctly raised, and, in his opinion, that had never been done by any of the Bills before them.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Beresford Hope

Bill to prohibit the Sale of Intoxicating Liquors on Sunday in England and Wales, ordered to be brought in by Mr. CHARLES WILSON, Mr. BIRLEY, Mr. M'ARTHUR, Mr. OSBORNE MORGAN, and Mr. JAMES.

PARLIAMENT—ORDER.—DIVISIONS.

MR. BERESFORD HOPE rose to put a point of Order to Mr. Speaker. He had just been, with some other hon. Members, shut out in the dark, low passage leading to the Lobby during the division. He desired to acknowledge the great comfort and convenience of opening the Lobby in a large, and particularly in a late division. But when the division was comparatively early and small there was another side to the question. The convenience to Members dividing was small, while the inconvenience of cutting off circulation by the way which the architect had provided was cruel and great. During such divisions access to and from the Library was hard, except by the circuitous passage by the Central Hall, St. Stephen's Hall, Westminster Hall, and the Cloisters. He desired to ask Mr. Speaker what was the rule on such occasions?

MR. SPEAKER said, that the practice of opening the Lobby to Members during a division had prevailed for many years, and, being found convenient, instructions had been given to the Serjeant-at-Arms to open the Lobby to Members during divisions whenever the number of Members in either Lobby exceeded 150. In the division referred to by the hon. Gentleman 260 Members voted, and, consequently, the Serjeant-at-Arms had been justified in opening the Lobby according to the usual practice.

AGRICULTURAL TENEMENTS SECURITY FOR IMPROVEMENTS BILL.

INDIA—THE SALT LAWS.—QUESTION.

MR. POTTER asked the Under Secretary of State for India, If he will lay upon the Table of the House a Return of the convictions and punishments inflicted for breach of the Salt Laws in India during the last year?

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON: In reply to the Question of the hon. Member, I have to state that there is no complete or exact information on this subject in the hands of the Department. We have a Return of the convictions and fines imposed for breaches of the salt laws in Bengal, a Return of the convictions for salt smuggling in Bombay, and a Return of the convictions for breaches of the Customs laws, which principally relate to salt, of the Inland Customs Department of the Government of India, but we have no details on the subject from Madras. A uniform Return will be called for from the Government of India relating to all India, and if the hon. Member will move for it we shall be happy to lay it upon the Table as soon as we receive it.

POST OFFICE—POSTAGE RATES TO INDIA.—QUESTION.

MR. POTTER asked the Postmaster General, If he will state the intention of Government as to the present high rate of Postage between Great Britain and the Empire of India; and, whether India will speedily enjoy the benefit of the International postal system?

LORD JOHN MANNERS, in reply, said, that India was admitted to the benefits of the International postal system on the 1st of July last, and since that date had had the benefit of the union system. In consequence a single letter might now be sent from any part of the United Kingdom to any part of India for 6d., reduced from 9d., via Southampton, and for 8d., reduced from 1s., via Brindisi.

TURKEY—ENGLISH OFFICERS IN THE TURKISH SERVICE.—QUESTIONS.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL asked the First Lord of the Admiralty, Whether Captain the honourable A. C. Hobart of the Royal Navy, who name was struck off on his entering the Turkish Service in accordance with the rules of the British Service, and who was then employed in subjecting the Christians of Crete, has since, while still in the Turkish Service, been restored to the British Service and permitted to obtain rank and retired pay to which he was not previously entitled; if so, by whom and when he was struck off the Navy List, and by whom and when restored; whether Captain Hobart was placed on the active list before being retired, the amount of his retired pay, from what date it commenced, and whether it has been commuted; what Order in Council or Treasury sanction was obtained authorizing the grant of retired pay to a person who had been out of the public service for several years; and, whether there will be any objection to lay upon the Table the Correspondence between Captain Hobart, the Admiralty, and the Foreign Office with reference to that Officer's removal from and restoration to the Navy, and to any intermediate applications from him; and also whether the calculation of his service for retired pay will be given?

MR. HUNT: In reply to the Question of the hon. Baronet, I have to state that Captain Hobart's name was removed from the list of the Royal Navy in March, 1868, by direction of Mr. Corry, then First Lord of the Admiralty, at the instance of my noble Friend (Lord Derby), then, as now, Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, for entering the service of a foreign Government without previous permission from Her Majesty's Government. He was restored to the active list, and the same day placed on the retired list—namely, on the 28th of November, 1874, by Order in Council obtained by me at the instance of the Foreign Office. His retired pay, which has not been commuted, commenced from the same day. His retired pay of £1 a-day was calculated on the ordinary basis under Order in Council of 1870. As to whether there is any objection to produce the Correspondence it would be necessary to consult Lord Derby.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether, under present circumstances, any measures have been taken or will be taken to prevent Naval or Military Officers holding retired rank, pay, or pension, or obtaining commutation money for pay or pension from entering the Turkish Service, and especially whether there is now anything to prevent an Officer desiring to act contrary to the rules of his own Service, or without the permission of the proper authorities, from commuting retired pay or pension and then entering the Turkish Service, and even engaging in war with an ally of Her Majesty in case that ally should attempt to enforce on the Porte objects which Her Majesty's Government has lately attempted to obtain by remonstrance?

MR. GATHORNE HARDY: In reply to the Question of the hon. Member I have to state that the rules of the Military Service are:—1. No officer on retired or half pay can enter a foreign army without leave, under a penalty of removal from the Army and a loss of emoluments. 2. Officers who commute under present Regulations are no longer in the Army, and Government has therefore no control over their actions. Officers applying to commute are not bound, either by Regulation or Act of Parliament, to give their reasons for wishing to commute, and it is not intended to make any alteration in the Regulations in this respect.

BOARD OF EDUCATION, SCOTLAND. QUESTION.

DR. CAMERON asked the Lord Advocate, Whether it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government to prolong the existence of the Scottish Board of Education?

THE LORD ADVOCATE: The only reply which I can make at present to the hon. Gentleman is, that the question as to the propriety of continuing the Board of Education in Scotland is receiving the serious consideration of Her Majesty's Government.

DR. CAMERON: I beg to give Notice that, in consequence of the Answer of the hon. and learned Lord Advocate, I shall call the attention of the House to the subject, and move a Resolution.

INTERMEDIATE EDUCATION, IRELAND —LEGISLATION.—QUESTION.

MR. O'SHAUGHNESSY asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland, If it is the intention of the Government to deal with the question of Intermediate Education in Ireland during this Session?

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH: I am fully aware of the importance of this subject, and how desirable it is that it should be dealt with by the Government and by Parliament. But those who have most studied it know how very full it is of difficulties. I devoted much attention to it last autumn, and have now, in a somewhat advanced stage of preparation, a scheme with regard to it; and, should I obtain the sanction of the Government, I hope with much confidence to be able to submit a measure to Parliament during the present Session.

NATIONAL SCHOOL TEACHERS, IRELAND—PAYMENT BY FEES.

QUESTION.

MR. O'REILLY asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland, If he will lay upon the Table of the House, a Copy of the new regulations as to the payment of results fees to teachers of National Schools in Ireland?

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH: If the hon. Member will move for a copy of these Regulations, I do not think there will be any objection to produce them. But, before making any actual promise on the subject, I should like to communicate with the Commissioners of National Education, by whom they were issued.

FACTORY AND WORKSHOPS ACTS—THE CANAL POPULATION.—QUESTION.

MR. HEYGATE asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether Her Majesty's Government propose to carry out the recommendation of the Factory and Workshops Acts Commissioners, that—

“The residence in canal boats of female young persons, and of children above the age of three years, should be forbidden”

by legislation in the present Session?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS: The subject of the hon. Member's Question deserves consideration, because the floating population of the class to which he refers is at the present moment in a very unsatisfactory position. Too much praise cannot be given to Mr. Smith for his labours in bettering the condition of those persons. Although I agree in the main with the recommendations of the Factory and Workshops Acts Commissioners, I am not prepared to adopt entirely the suggestions made in their Report. It is, however, quite necessary that if persons sleep on board these boats, the boats should be registered in somewhat the same way as lodging-houses are.

COURT OF SESSION, SCOTLAND.

QUESTION.

MR. J. W. BARCLAY asked the Lord Advocate, Whether his attention has been drawn to a statement of the sittings during a fortnight of the five Lords Ordinary of the Court of Session, published in the “Scotsman” newspaper of 11th December last, showing that for the fortnight one of their Lordships sat altogether for twelve hours, another for fifteen hours, and the average sittings of the whole was about thirty hours each; and whether, with so little business to discharge, he will recommend the Crown to fill up the Judgeship now vacant?

THE LORD ADVOCATE: I have to inform the hon. Member for Forfarshire that it is not the intention of the Government to recommend Her Majesty to fill up the Judgeship now vacant, but I hope in a short time to ask the leave of the House to introduce a Bill dealing with the subject. With respect to the former part of the Question, I can only now say that my attention was called to the statement shortly after its publication. I have received other communications, some affirming, others questioning its truth, but I have not thought it necessary to direct any inquiry.

DOUBLE SHERIFFS, SCOTLAND—LEGISLATION.—QUESTION.

MR. M'LAREN asked the Lord Advocate, Whether Her Majesty's Government are about to take steps for abolishing the double sheriffships in Scotland, and for re-arranging the districts and salaries of the sheriff substitutes, so as to allow to those who may be appointed to the more important and laborious districts increased salaries out of the savings to be effected by the abolition of the double sheriffships?

THE LORD ADVOCATE: It is not the intention of Her Majesty's Government at present to deal with the question of double sheriffships in Scotland.

BANCO.—QUESTION.

MR. SERJEANT SIMON asked Mr. Attorney General, Whether the attention of Her Majesty's Government has been called to the want of accommodation for holding additional Courts, of Judges sitting singly in Banco, as required by the Judicature Amendment Act of last Session; and whether anything is being done to supply the deficiency?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL: Attention has been called to the fact that there have appeared in the newspapers statements to the effect that complaints had been made by some of the learned Judges that there were no Courts in which they could sit singly under the Act of last year, and that for this reason more Judges were obliged to sit in Banco than the Act contemplated. No communication as to the want of accommodation was, however, made to the Lord Chancellor or the Office of Works; but after the commencement of the Hilary Sittings the Lord Chancellor noticed the statements in the newspapers to which I have referred. He at once made inquiries, in conjunction with the Office of Works, with a view to the provision of further accommodation. It was ascertained that every Court in Westminster Hall was fully occupied, and also the Westminster Sessions House; but the Office of Works agreed to have ready on two days' notice two large rooms with retiring rooms at Richmond Terrace, being rooms in which Royal Commissioners had sat, and which would be sufficient for the temporary accommodation of the Judges sitting in Banco. The learned Judges were accordingly informed by the Lord Chancellor, at a council of the Judges on the 20th of January, that these rooms would be ready at any time on two days' notice, and further that as the Judge of the Admiralty Court was about to attend at the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council at the hearing of a cause which would occupy about 10 days, the Court in which he usually sat would also be available for that interval. I believe after this communication the Admiralty Court was made use of, but the Judges were enabled to do without the rooms in Richmond Terrace.

THE SLAVE TRADE—ZANZIBAR.
QUESTION.

SIR ROBERT ANSTRUTHER asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, What steps have been taken by Her Majesty's Government to carry out the Resolution of the House of the 4th of April last, which was in the terms following:—

“That, in the opinion of this House, it is desirable that Her Majesty's Government should invite and assist the Sultan of Zanzibar to take such further steps as may be necessary for the total suppression of the Slave Trade within his dominions, and that at the same time more adequate provision should be made for the care and maintenance of the liberated slaves?”

MR. BOURKE, in reply, said, he was happy to inform the hon. Baronet that no intimation from the Government had been necessary, because the Sultan of Zanzibar had gone far beyond his Treaty engagements. He had not only carried out those engagements, but he had also suppressed slavery altogether in his dominions, and he had stopped the caravans which used to be fitted out for expeditions into the north. Under these circumstances, any intimation from the Government to the Sultan of Zanzibar to continue his efforts in that direction would be inopportune. The Government had had the question of the care and maintenance of liberated slaves under their consideration for some time, and at present they thought it best to send the able-bodied slaves to Natal, while the children of both sexes were handed over from time to time to the missionaries of Zanzibar.

CRIMINAL LAW—CASE OF JOHN HUNT.
QUESTION.

MR. JOSEPH COWEN asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, If it is correct that a man named John Hunt was three years ago, at the Liverpool Assizes, convicted of a garotte robbery in that town and sentenced to ten years' penal servitude and twenty-five lashes with the cat, and that, after having been flogged and having undergone two years' and a half of penal servitude, he has been pardoned, because it has been shown that he was innocent of the offence he was convicted of and punished for; and, if this statement be correct, what recompense the Government propose to make to Hunt for the injustice that has been done to him, the pain and indignity he has suffered, and the loss he has sustained?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS, in reply, said, he was afraid his hon. Friend was misinformed as to the facts of this case. The prisoner was tried at the Liverpool Assizes, for highway robbery, and was sentenced to penal servitude. A petition was sent to the Home Office on the subject. The defence set up was an alibi. The learned Judge who tried the case was strongly of opinion that that alibi could not be proved. Latter on another petition was sent to the Home Office to the same effect, and he referred that again to the learned Judge, who was still of the same opinion, and he (Mr. Cross) was bound to say, after the most careful consideration of the case, that he entirely agreed with the learned Judge. But after some time a final petition came on behalf of the man, and on looking at the whole circumstances of the case, at his previous good character, and at his youth—although he was then and now of the same opinion that an alibi could not be proved—he thought he might be justified in recommending this man to Her Majesty's clemency, so as to give him a fresh start in life.

ARMY—COURTS MARTIAL—LEGISLATION.—QUESTION.

SIR COLMAN O'LOGHLEN asked the Judge Advocate, If it be his intention, or the intention of Her Majesty's Government, to introduce this Session any measure to carry out the recommendations made by the Court Martial Commission in 1869 for amending and improving the constitution and practice of Courts Martial in the Army?

MR. CAVENDISH BENTINCK: A measure relating to the subject has been under the consideration of the Government; but at this moment I am not able to say whether it can be submitted to Parliament during the present Session.

EDUCATIONAL ENDOWMENTS, SCOTLAND—LEGISLATION.—QUESTION.

SIR EDWARD COLEBROKE asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether it is the intention of the Government to introduce any Bill in the present Session with reference to existing Educational Endowments in Scotland?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS, in reply, said, he quite admitted the importance of the subject, which had had the attention of the Government and of the Lord Advocate a long time; and although a Bill might not be introduced in the present Session, it was certainly a matter that could not be put off.

MERCHANT SHIPPING ACTS—LEGISLATION.—QUESTION.

MR. GORST asked the President of the Board of Trade, When it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government, in fulfilment of the promise made last Session, to introduce a Bill to amend the "discipline sections" of the existing Merchant Shipping Acts?

SIR CHARLES ADDERLEY, in reply, said, it was his intention shortly to ask leave to introduce a Bill on the subject of Seamen's Discipline.

ARMY—2ND BATTALION, 19TH FOOT. QUESTION.

SIR CHARLES RUSSELL asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether his attention has been called to a letter which appeared in the "Standard" newspaper of the 22nd January, signed "How to spoil a Regiment," and also to a leading article in the same newspaper of the 24th ultimo founded on the previous letter; and whether he can state if there is any truth in the allegations therein contained against a distinguished Regiment of Her Majesty's service?

MR. GATHORNE HARDY: Yes; both my attention and that of His Royal Highness the Commander-in-Chief has been called to the letter and article in question, and it being evident that they referred to the 2nd Battalion, 19th Foot, the General Officer commanding at Portsmouth (Sir Hastings Doyle) was ordered by His Royal Highness to inquire into the matter. This he did most fully, and in submitting Colonel Chipindall's explanation reported "that this distinguished officer had most ably defended himself against the vile aspersions which had been cast against his character as a commanding officer."

His Royal Highness, after a full con-consideration of the circumstances, caused Sir Hastings Doyle to be informed "that he entirely agreed with him that Colonel Chippindall had most completely and conclusively disproved the whole of the scandalous accusations which were made against him."

and desired that this should be communicated to Colonel Chippindall.

GRAND JURY LAWS, IRELAND— LEGISLATION.—QUESTION.

THE O'CONOR DON asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland, Whether the Government intend to bring in any Bill this Session dealing with the Grand Jury Laws in Ireland?

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH: I believe there is a desire on both sides of the House for some legislation on this subject; but judging from past debates, I think there is a marked difference of opinion as to what that legislation should be. I would remind the hon. Member that there are already before the House three Irish measures of first-class importance introduced by Her Majesty's Government; and until some progress has been made with them I certainly could not promise to undertake a Bill on such a subject as Grand Jury reform.

SUEZ CANAL—ANNUAL PAPERS. QUESTION.

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer. Whether Her Majesty's Government will lay upon the Table the Report of the Directors, and that of the general meeting held in January, of the Suez Canal Company, and also the Reports received by Her Majesty's Government from the English official Directors of the Company?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER, in reply, said, he thought it would be a most convenient course to lay annually before Parliament such Reports connected with the proceedings of the Suez Canal Company as could properly be laid before Parliament. There were some communications of a confidential nature between the English directors and Her Majesty's Government; but such Reports as could be properly laid before Parliament would be.

ARMY PROMOTION AND RETIREMENT. QUESTION.

MR. OWEN LEWIS asked the Secretary of State for War, If it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government to carry into effect the recommendations of the Commission on Army Promotion and Retirement; and, if so, what steps they intend to take for the purpose, and when?

MR. GATHORNE HARDY: Since the Commission has reported—and I am not surprised that they have taken a long time in coming to their Report—I have been carefully considering the whole question connected with promotion and retirement. Great progress has been made with a plan on the subject; but I have not yet been able to submit it to the Treasury or the Government. Without pledging myself to details, I may say that the plan will proceed generally on the lines recommended by the Commission.

MR. OWEN LEWIS: When will it be brought forward?

MR. GATHORNE HARDY: That is exactly my difficulty. It will soon be in a shape to be put before the Treasury, but I cannot say how long it will remain there.

TURKEY—THE GREEK SUBJECTS. QUESTION.

LORD ROBERT MONTAGU asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether the following information (regarding proceedings at Athens of our two Plenipotentiaries), contained in the "Times" of February 13th, is correct: viz.—

"Sir Henry Elliot, confining his political visits to the members of the present Ministry, endeavoured, as formerly, to prove the wisdom of inaction on the part of the Greek subjects of Turkey, and maintained that the kingdom is bound by international obligations to refrain from fomenting discontent and aiding insurrection among them. Lord Salisbury, whose sympathies seemed to differ essentially from those of his late colleague at the Conference, spoke to the chief men of all parties in favour of the aspirations of the Greeks, admitting the right of those still under Turkey to regain, when possible, their natural liberty, and of their fellow-countrymen to aid them in so doing;"

and, whether Her Majesty's Government authorized Lord Salisbury to assert such principles?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: It is true that Lord Salisbury and Sir Henry Elliot, on their return from Constantinople, stopped at Athens, but that was for their own convenience, and not under any instructions from Her Majesty's Government. Neither had they any instructions as to any language they were to hold there, and Her Majesty's Government have no official cognizance of any private conversation which may have occurred. But I have no objection to state to the House that Lord Salisbury has told me, as a private friend, that the statement with regard to himself is wholly untrue.

TRIAL OF ELECTION PETITIONS—LEGISLATION.—QUESTION.

MR. SERJEANT SIMON asked Mr. Attorney General, Whether it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government this Session to introduce a Bill for the purpose of giving effect to the recommendations of the Select Committee of 1875 respecting the tribunals for the trial of Election Petitions, and the amendment of the Law relating to Corrupt Practices at Parliamentary Elections?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL: I beg to state that it is the intention of the Government to introduce such a Bill, and that it will give effect to some of the recommendations of the Select Committee of 1875.

THE ARCTIC EXPEDITION—OUTBREAK OF SCURVY.—QUESTION.

DR. WARD asked the First Lord of the Admiralty, Whether an inquiry has been ordered into the outbreak of scurvy among the crews of H.M.S. "Alert" and "Discovery" during the recent expedition to the North Pole; and, if so, whether he will lay the Report upon the Table of the House?

MR. HUNT: Yes, I have appointed a Committee to inquire into the cause of this outbreak of scurvy. The Committee has made very considerable progress in its labours, and I hope before long it will make its Report. I shall be happy to lay both the Report and the evidence on the Table when I have received them.

CRIMINAL LAW—THE ESCAPED
FENIAN CONVICTS.—QUESTION.

MR. GOLDSMID asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, What action has been taken by the Government in consequence of the escape of Fenian convicts from Freemantle, Western Australia, in the American ship "Catalpa," which it is reported was sent expressly for the purpose of receiving the said convicts?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: It has not been deemed expedient to take any action in the matter referred to, beyond making a strict inquiry into it, and a revision of the local arrangements under which the escape of the convicts occurred.

MAGISTRATES, IRELAND—DEBTORS
ACT—REMOVAL OF MR. W. J. DEVLIN.

QUESTION.

MR. DICKSON asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland, Whether any steps have been taken to cancel the Commission of the Peace issued to Mr. William James Devlin, of Cookstown, a few days previous to the disappearance of that gentleman, on account of his bankruptcy; or whether, in case of his return, he will still be entitled to sit on the Bench as one of Her Majesty's Justices of the Peace for county Tyrone?

SIR MICHAEL HICKS - BEACH: The Lord Chancellor of Ireland, with whom these matters rest, informs me that Section 21 of the Debtors (Ireland) Act, 1872, renders a justice of the peace who has been adjudged bankrupt incapable of acting as such until he has been newly assigned. He adds, however, that he has superseded Mr. Devlin in the commission of the peace.

METROPOLIS—HYDE PARK, ROTTEN ROW.—QUESTION.

MR. LOCKE asked the First Commissioner of Works, Whether he considers it necessary to provide accommodation for equestrians in Hyde Park during the winter months, and whether care will be taken in future to prevent Rotten Row being closed during the winter; and, if he can say how long it will be before the rides in Hyde Park are in a fit and safe state for riding?

MR. GERARD NOEL: Sir, I think it most important that accommodation should be provided for equestrians in Hyde Park during the winter months. I can assure the House that everything has been done by the Department to hurry on the works as quickly as possible; but we have had two difficulties to contend with—the unprecedented amount of wet, and also the impossibility of obtaining sufficient and proper material for the foundation. The contractors were bound by their contract to put the upper part of Rotten Row, which had not yet been re-made, into good condition. This has been done; it was opened last Monday, and I trust the public will have no cause for complaint. With regard to the upper part of the Ride adjacent to Kensington Gardens, and opposite the late Knightsbridge Barracks, every exertion has been made to keep it in proper order during the winter; but, as the hon. Member knows, the foundation is defective, in many places there is nothing but mud and sand, and the more you meddled with it during the wet weather the worse it became; but lately I have ordered that part of the Ride to be thoroughly overhauled, the bad places mended, good material to be put down and covered with gravel, and I hope to be able to keep it safe and in good condition during the summer. I regret exceedingly that my hon. Friend and the public have been deprived of their accustomed rides during the last few months; but it was decided that Rotten Row should be re-made; it was essential, therefore, to shut it up. I thought it better to close it during the autumn and early winter months, as I well know the censure which would have been passed upon me by the hon. Member for Southwark and my Friends behind me if I had left Rotten Row open during the autumn and put a barrier across the ride on the 8th of February. I hope before the end of this year to have Rotten Row and the Ride in thorough good condition, and to maintain it in good condition.

TURKEY—THE CONFERENCE—WITHDRAWAL OF THE AMBASSADORS.

QUESTIONS.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, referring to the despatch of Lord Derby to the Marquess of Salisbury and Sir Henry Elliot, of the date of Jan. 19, 1877, stating that—

“Mussurus Pasha endeavoured to argue that the rejection of the proposals of the Powers need not entail the departure of the Ambassadors from Constantinople; but I declined to enter into this question, as I said the course to be followed had been settled some time since and had been formally announced to the Porte;”

Whether there are any Papers showing such formal announcement to the Porte other than the Eighth Protocol of Jan. 15, 1877; and, if so, whether he will lay such Papers upon the Table; whether the simultaneous withdrawal of the Ambassadors from Constantinople was determined upon in concert by the six guaranteeing Powers; and, whether he will lay upon the Table any Papers relating to such concert and agreement amongst the Powers; whether it was intended by Her Majesty's Government that any different meaning should be attached to the departure of Sir Henry Elliot from Constantinople from that which was given in the Protocol of Jan. 15 to the withdrawal of the Ambassadors of Austria, Russia, Italy, Germany, and France; and if so, whether the intention to make such distinction was previously communicated to the Porte and the five Powers; and, whether Sir Henry Elliot left Constantinople on ordinary leave, or whether he was directed by Her Majesty's Government to depart in consequence of the rejection of the proposals of the Six Powers by the Porte, and in order to show displeasure on the part of England in like manner as in the case of the threatened withdrawal of Sir Henry Elliot on October 5th, as explained in the Despatch of Lord Derby to Lord Odo Russell of October 16th 1876?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: The answer, in brief, to the Questions of the hon. and learned Gentleman is that there are no Papers upon any of those points beyond what are contained in the Blue Books. With regard to the first Question, the hon. and learned Gentleman asked whether there are any Papers with reference to the formal announcement to the Porte of the course which Sir Henry Elliot was to follow. The communication was made to Lord Salisbury, with a view to its communication to Sir Henry Elliot, by telegraphic despatch of December 22, and that was the foundation of the communication which was afterwards formally made to the Porte at the sitting of the eighth meeting of the Conference. That had occurred before the conversation between Lord Derby and Musurus Pasha, on the 19th of January. There are no other Papers on the subject. With regard to the withdrawal of the Ambassadors from Constantinople, the hon. and learned Gentleman will see by looking at the different despatches in the Blue Book the exact course that was followed. The question, in the first instance, was put by Lord Salisbury on, I think, the 17th of December. He had his Instructions given to him on the 22nd of December, and then there were those proceedings at the Conference. With respect to the Question, whether it was intended by Her Majesty's Government that any different meaning should be attached to the departure of Sir Henry Elliot from Constantinople from that which was to be attached to the withdrawal of the Ambassadors of the other Powers, I can only say that there is no indication in the record of any intention to make such a distinction, and that the Instructions given and the intention manifested by the withdrawal of the Ambassadors will be gathered from what occurred in the Conference. The Instructions given to Sir Henry Elliot were those which are contained in the telegram to Lord Salisbury—that is to say, that he was to come to England and report upon the situation. That is the answer to the hon. and learned Gentleman's last Question. Sir Henry Elliot did not leave Constantinople on ordinary leave, because he was desired to come to England and report on the situation. Neither was he desired to depart from Constantinople in order to show the displeasure of England in like manner as in the case of his threatened withdrawal on the 6th of October, the circumstances being quite different from what they were at the time the Instructions were given to him when the subject of the armistice was under consideration. The whole of the information will be found in the Papers.

MALTA—CIVIL AND MILITARY GOVERNORS.—QUESTION.

MR. ANDERSON asked the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether, since the question came up last year, Her Majesty's Government have further considered the expediency of dividing the Governorship of Malta on the expiry of the present appointment, and having in future a Military Governor paid for by Britain, and a Civil Governor paid for by Malta, each at a moderate salary, instead of a single highly paid Military Governor as at present?

MR. J. LOWTHER: In the opinion of Her Majesty's Government such an arrangement as that referred to by the hon. Gentleman would probably lead to an undesirable conflict of authority which in a fortress should be centred in one person, and that person should be the officer in chief command of the troops. The facilities of communication between Malta and England, the presence of able and experienced Civil officers, and the attention given by the Secretary of State to all matters of interest to the community are sufficient, in the opinion of Her Majesty's Government, to prevent the existence under the present system of any inconveniences which cannot be promptly remedied.

THE ARCTIC EXPEDITION — DOUBLE TIME.—QUESTION.

CAPTAIN PIM, asked the First Lord of the Admiralty, Whether the officers or men, or both of the late Arctic Expedition have been granted double time as well as double pay during their period of service?

MR. HUNT, in reply, said, that neither the officers nor the men had been granted double time.

VACCINATION — DEATHS FROM ERYSIPELAS.—QUESTION.

MR. WETHERED, asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether the Government has received information of the deaths of six children at or near Gainsborough from erysipelas consequent upon vaccination which had been performed by the appointed officer with lymph derived from the arm of a child vaccinated by such officer with "points" supplied to him by the National Vaccine Establishment; whether they have heard of other cases of severe erysipelas having occurred in the same district in the same way; and, what steps the Government have taken or will take in the matter?

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH: The Government have received information, I am sorry to say, of the death of the children mentioned in the hon. Gentleman's Question, and I have caused a careful investigation of the circumstances of the cases to be made by Mr. Netten Radcliffe, one of the Inspectors of the Local Government Board. It is true that the children were vaccinated with lymph taken from a child which had been vaccinated from points supplied by the National Vaccine Establishment, but no symptoms of erysipelas appeared in that child, and it appears certain that the lymph furnished by it did not convey any infection of erysipelas. Moreover, there is no reason to suppose that the infection in any of the cases can be attributed to the lymph which was used. There have been other cases of erysipelas in the district, some of them following, others entirely disconnected with vaccination. The whole of the facts are fully detailed in Mr. Radcliffe's exhaustive Report, which I propose to lay on the Table of the House.

ARMY MEDICAL DEPARTMENT — APPOINTMENTS.—QUESTION.

MR. DUNBAR, asked the Secretary of State for War, How many candidates have presented themselves at the examination now going on for admission to the Army Medical Department; whether it had been announced that fifty appointments would be offered for competition; and whether he is aware that fifty candidates have presented themselves for the twenty-seventh appointments in the Indian Medical Department offered for competition?

MR. GATHORNE HARDY, in reply, said, that while 23 candidates had presented themselves for the 50 appointments offered in the Army Medical Department, 49 candidates had offered themselves for 27 appointments in the same branch of the Indian Service.

FOREST OF DEAN—LEGISLATION.

QUESTION.

MR. MONK, asked the Secretary to the Treasury, Whether it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government to introduce a Bill this Session with reference to the Crown Lands in the Forest of Dean?

MR. W. H. SMITH, in reply, said, he hoped shortly to introduce such a Bill.

NAVY—H.M.S. "THUNDERER."

QUESTION.

MR. SEELY asked the First Lord of the Admiralty, Whether the Committee of scientific gentlemen appointed, in July last, by the Admiralty and the contractors for the engines and boilers of H.M.S. "Thunderer" to investigate the causes of the explosion on board that vessel, have made their Report; and, if so, whether he will lay it upon the Table of the House?

MR. HUNT: No such Committee as is referred to in the Question of the hon. Member was appointed by the Admiralty and by the contractors for the machinery of the Thunderer. The Engineer-in-Chief of the Admiralty, two Engineer officers, three members of the Boiler Committee, and Mr. Bramwell, a civil engineer of eminence, received instructions from the Admiralty to examine the exploded boiler and the stokehold, and to hold themselves in readiness to give evidence before the Coroner at the inquest. Of these gentlemen, Mr. Bramwell alone was examined by the Coroner; but it was understood that he expressed the opinion of all the experts who were associated with him in the investigation. The whole of the evidence was taken down by a shorthand writer employed by the Admiralty.

TURKEY—CHRISTIANS IN TURKEY.

QUESTION.

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether the Foreign Office possesses any Reports from Consuls in Turkey stating the grievances of the Christian subjects of the Porte of a date later than 1867; and, if so, whether the Government will produce them?

MR. BOURKE, in reply, said, that there were several Reports on the subject which the Government had no objection to produce, though some time would necessarily elapse before they could be laid on the Table.

TURKEY—THE BULGARIAN INSURRECTION. — QUESTION.

MR. GLADSTONE: On Tuesday the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Bourke) was good enough to undertake to inquire whether it would be possible for the Government, who can do it much better than a private Member, to extract from the Blue Books a Return, so far as the information at their command enables them to make one, of the sentences pronounced and executed upon persons concerned in the Bulgarian rising and upon the persons concerned in the suppression of that rising. I wish to ask, Whether he can give me an answer on that point?

MR. BOURKE: I have to state that from the information we have in the Office I shall not, I am afraid, be able to give the right hon. Gentleman much more information than I gave him the other day; but, seeing the desire for further particulars, I thought it right to ask permission of the Secretary of State to telegraph to Constantinople on the subject. We have telegraphed to Constantinople, sending a copy of the Notice given by the right hon. Gentleman, and I hope we shall be able to obtain the information he requires in the most complete form.

ZANZIBAR—INLAND ROUTES.

QUESTION.

MR. WHALLEY asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, with reference to the relations between our Government and the Sultan of Zanzibar, Whether his attention had been called to a letter which has appeared in the public journals from His Highness the Sultan, and read by Dr. Badger at a meeting of the Society of Arts, on the occasion of Commander Cameron's lecture last month, expressing his, the Sultan's wish to co-operate in the construction of a road from the coast to the interior, and offering all the assistance in his power for the maintenance and use of such road through his dominions; and whether, in the event of such work being taken in hand by private enterprise, Her Majesty's Government would be prepared to recognise and support such effort, either by the grant of a Royal Charter or otherwise?

MR. BOURKE, in reply, said, that while the Government were desirous of seeing communication opened up between the coast of Zanzibar and the interior, they did not think it expedient to give their support to any particular scheme of that nature.

Mr. Gladstone

TURKISH ATROCITIES—CONSUL FREEMAN'S DESPATCH.—QUESTIONS.

MR. HENRY SAMUELSON asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether he has any objection to supplement the Papers on Turkey already issued by laying upon the Table Consul Freeman's Despatch to Lord Derby, dated as early as March 17th 1876, mentioned by Sir Henry Elliot in his Despatch to Lord Derby of November 23rd 1876, which Sir Henry Elliot, according to that Despatch, upon April 3rd 1876, instructed Mr. Sandison to communicate to Raschid Pasha, with the remark that—

“When authentic accounts of such abominations were received in Europe, they must excite the indignation of the civilized world, and no surprise need be felt if public sympathy were upon the side of those who struggled to free themselves from a Government under which they were exposed to treatment such as described.”

The hon. Member also asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs to explain why that Despatch, having been received very early in the Spring of 1876, had not been included in the Blue Book just issued?

MR. BOURKE, in reply, said, that there was no objection under ordinary circumstances to lay these despatches on the Table of the House. The despatch would have been laid before the House last year, but that it was thought right at that time to withhold it, until the Turkish Government had had an opportunity of giving such explanation as they could with regard to the alleged atrocious outrages. When the Blue Books were being prepared this year, amongst the mass of Papers before the gentlemen who prepared them, this despatch, which related altogether to a different series, was omitted by mistake.

(Mr. Secretary Cross, Sir Henry Selwin-Ibbetson.)

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, “That the Bill be now read a second time.”—(Mr. Assheton Cross.)

MR. RYLANDS, in moving that the Bill be read a second time that day six months, complained that the House was asked to adopt a measure entailing a large additional expenditure, at a time when the Revenue was declining, and the expenditure in every Department was increasing. The Estimates for the Civil Services, which had just been presented, showed an increase of not less than £400,000, and he supposed that the demands for the Army and Navy would be upon a larger scale than last year. Under those circumstances he thought the introduction of the Bill most inopportune; and if it were urged that the additional charge would not be felt during the present year, that formed a most objectionable feature of the case, and was merely the common argument of the spendthrift, who put off the evil day and justified his extravagance by the hope that something might turn up before he was called upon to meet his engagements. The measure before the House was, in its material particulars, the same as that introduced last Session. There were, however, two alterations to which he wished to call attention. The first had reference to the arrangements proposed to be made with prison authorities in connection with the disposal of the gaols, and although the new terms were more equitable, he feared that there were still cases in which considerable injustice would be done, and he thought that if the Bill were read a second time it should be referred to a Select Committee, who could receive evidence from different localities with a view of preventing any injustice. The other alteration in the Bill had reference to the position of the visiting justices, and was no doubt intended by the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary as a sop thrown out to them. It was, however, a mere shadow of authority that was given to them, and it would make little difference in the working of the Bill whether the visiting justices were controlled by a Government Inspector, or by an Assistant Commissioner of Prisons. The Bill also confided to the justices, under certain conditions to be fixed by the right hon. Gentleman, and subject to his control, over every appointment, the nomination of subordinate officers of prisons, but it did not leave them dependent on the same authority after their appointment. It was humiliating to magistrates for the right hon. Gentleman to suppose that they could be gratified by any such pretence of maintaining their position. Either the whole authority over these officers should be left to the magistrates, or it should be taken over by the Government. Any middle course was objectionable, and he hoped that the clause would be struck out of the Bill, so that there could be no mistake as to the intention of the central authority acting through its own agency, and taking upon itself the whole responsibility. That was, in fact, the great object of the Bill. It was a sweeping measure, and was practically a Bill for the disestablishment of local prison authorities. There would not have been a chance of its success but for the existence of two great influences in its favour. One of these was the desire of Government officials to get as much power and patronage as possible. For many years past there had been a constant advance in the direction of centralization and of interference with the independent action of local authorities. He did not charge his right hon. Friend the Home Secretary with any wish to increase his own patronage; but he thought he might fairly say that a change had come over the right hon. Gentleman since he entered office, and that he had lost the healthy independent spirit which marked him as a county magistrate, and was now mainly inspired by the genius loci of the Home Office. It was in fact the permanent officials who were at the bottom of this conspiracy against the exercise of local authority. These spending servants of the Crown formed a great army, and as was once remarked by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich (Mr. Gladstone), they were always awake to their own interests; and whenever public opinion slept they took advantage of the opportunity of increasing the flow of promotion by the creation of new offices, and by advances in the rates of pay. They constituted, in fact, a great trades union, and every year were increasing in numbers and in influence. The cost of Government Boards and Establishments was already enormous. Let hon. Gentlemen glance over the pages of the Civil Service Estimates, and they would find under Class II., long lists of Commissioners, Assistant Commissioners, Secretaries, Assistant Secretaries, Inspectors, sub-Inspectors, assistant Inspectors, Clerks, Law Officers, and a whole host of other officials. In one Department alone—the Local Government Board—the expenditure for salaries, &c., amounted to £715,000, or nearly three-quarters of a million a-year. In fact they were rapidly creating a net work of officialism throughout the country, so that the time seemed rapidly approaching when every householder would have a policeman at his front door, and an inspector in his backyard. It was this policy of centralization and officialism that supplied the reason why the Bill found such favour on the Treasury Bench, and the other great inducement in its support was the bribe held out of the relief to local burdens. That was, however, a narrow and short-sighted policy. If the local taxpayer wished to get relief from those burdens, he would find himself mistaken if he supposed it was to be obtained by means of such proposals as that under discussion. The truth was, that local expenditure, notwithstanding Government subventions, was increasing, and these grants from the State would, in his opinion, tend to foster that increase by withdrawing from local authorities the motives for economy, or for taking an interest in the management of local affairs. The only effective method of keeping down local expenditure was to appoint county boards elected by the ratepayers; but if they continued to go in the direction of the present Bill, they would soon leave nothing for county boards to do. But for the desire of centralization on the one hand, and the claims for relief of local taxation on the other, he believed that the pleas put forward in support of the Bill would not be listened to for a moment, as they were hollow and would not bear examination. What were those pleas? The hon. Baronet the Member for South Devonshire (Sir Massey Lopes), stated them last year in the following words. He said:—

“The main evils under the existing system which the present measure sought to put an end to were the want of uniformity of the management of our gaols, the excessive number of those establishments, and the extravagant cost at which they are kept up.”—[3 Hansard, ccxxx. 287.]

The right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary took the same line, and in the discussion last year instanced the case of two or three small gaols—Tiverton and others—of which the cost of management appeared so heavy, that they had been quoted in the papers ever since as conclusive in favour of the Bill. But, in fact, the entire cost of these small gaols was a mere bagatelle. In England and Wales there were 17 of the smallest prisons containing less than 20 prisoners in each, and the total cost of all these small gaols, including Tiverton and the rest, was only £9,000 a-year, and yet it was on account of so trifling an outlay that the House was asked to make what practically amounted to a revolution in prison management. Besides these small gaols might be abolished, if deemed expedient, without the slightest difficulty; in the same way that 14 small prisons were discontinued under the Act of 1865, so that the argument in favour of the Bill drawn from that source was little more than a hollow pretence. What the House ought to look at was the annual average cost of the local prisons throughout the country, and that at the present time, even including the small gaols, did not amount to more than £27 per prisoner, which could not be considered under all the circumstances an unreasonable sum. But then it was alleged that the difference of treatment in gaols with regard to diet and the regulations as to hard labour were so great that some such change as that proposed was absolutely necessary. In support of that view the hon. Member for South Derbyshire (Mr. Evans) told a graphic story last year which naturally attracted attention. He said that an old offender stole some fowls near the boundary of the counties of Leicester and Derby, and, having cooked one of the fowls at a furnace, ate half of it and fell asleep. The next morning a policeman found him fast asleep with the remains of the spoil scattered round him, and on apprehending him the man rubbed his eyes, and the very first words he said were—“Do tell me in what county I am? In Leicestershire or Derbyshire?” “In Derbyshire, to be sure,” said the constable. The man instantly replied, “Thank God for that.” Now that story from internal evidence might safely be taken as an apocryphal one and was probably a canard which had been set flying in Derbyshire for some purpose or other, and had not only been accepted by the hon. Member as perfectly reliable, but had been repeated in various forms in the Press until a few days ago it was made use of as a serious argument in favour of the Bill. The Times remarked that—

“The difference inflicted in the various gaols involves an uncertainty respecting the penalties attached to criminal offences which most mischievously diminished the different effect of the law. Men have been known even to calculate in which county it was safest to run the risk of committing an offence, and have been heard to express satisfaction that they had been arrested in one county rather than another.”

As a matter of fact, there was not that great difference between the discipline and punishment of Derby and Leicester gaols, and if there were it would not need so improbable a story to prove it, as every year there were Reports of Inspectors of prisons presented to the Home Office and laid before Parliament, giving minute details of the treatment of prisoners both as regarded discipline and diet. A reference to the Inspectors' Reports of last year would show that in Derby Gaol prisoners for 7, 14, and 21 days after conviction, had to lie upon plank beds, which were punitive instruments, whilst in Leicester Gaol they enjoyed the use of mattresses. In Derby Gaol prisoners worked 9½ hours on the treadmill, and in Leicester only 5 to 8 hours. In both prisons the diet was very similar, but the punishment of dark and solitary cells appeared to be more frequent in Derby than in Leicester, so that if the “old offender” really did thank God for being taken to Derby instead of Leicester, he must have had peculiar notions of prison comforts, or have thanked God for very small mercies. No doubt there were irregularities in prison discipline, to a more limited extent, however, than was alleged in favour of the Bill, but whose fault was it? Clearly, the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary was as much to blame as the magistrates. Under the Act of 1865 it was provided that no rules for the diet of prisoners, or regulations in respect of hard labour, could be put in force without the express sanction of the Secretary of State. He had further the power of compelling the magistrates to submit to his decision in reference to prison regulations by withholding the Government grant from any prison in default. The right hon. Gentleman admitted in his speech last year that “great differences had escaped the notice of the Secretary of State,” and yet on account of these differences in prison regulations for which the Home Secretary was responsible, and which he had already the power to remove, they were urged to sweep away the local authorities, but it would be more just if the sweeping away commenced in the Home Office. A great plea put forward by the right hon. Gentleman in favour of the Bill was economy, and he assumed that he would save £50,000 a-year in the present cost of prisons, and that he would gain an additional £50,000 a-year from the earnings of prisoners. In entertaining any such hope he (Mr. Rylands), after carefully considering the question, was convinced that the right hon. Gentleman laboured under a perfect delusion. The expectation of economical management was entirely contrary to the experience of other Government establishments and even of Government prisons. In calculating upon saving a considerable amount in building and repairs by the closing of 50 gaols, the right hon. Gentleman had not considered how much he would have to spend in enlarging prisons and in building new ones. As soon as the prisons had been taken over, there would be a marvellous pressure put upon Government to induce them to spend money, and the alteration and repairs of prisons would lead to an enormous increase in the Civil Service Estimates. The 12 convict prisons under Government now cost in alterations and repairs alone, from £25,000 to £35,000 a-year; and during the last 10 years, under those heads, no less than £300,000 had been expended. If the Bill became law, there would be a large addition to the charge for superannuation—there would be five Prison Commissioners, several additional Inspectors and a large number of subordinate officers all over the country appointed, whose salaries would amount in the aggregate to no inconsiderable sum. Nor was the experience of the cost of management of Government prisons at all encouraging. The contrast between the average cost in county and borough gaols weighted with all the disadvantage of the smaller prisons which might be discontinued, and the cost of the convict prisons was remarkable. The average cost in local prisons was £27 per head, whilst that in convict prisons was £33 per head. In the Lancashire prisons the cost was only £17 per head, or about half the cost of Government management, which was held to be so economical. In the convict prison at Borstall, the expenditure amounted to £45 15s. per head. The calculations of the Home Secretary with respect to his obtaining an additional £50,000 a-year from prisoners' earnings were equally delusive. He appeared to think that because in Pentonville, the prisoners earned an average of £9 a-year, he could bring up the general run of prisoners to the same standard. But he entirely overlooked the fact that in Pentonville and the other convict prisons, the inmates were sentenced for long periods from 5 to 25 years, and consequently modes of employment could be found for them that might be profitable; but this, of course, could not be done in the local prisons, where most of the prisoners had only to serve short sentences. He believed, indeed, he was under the mark in saying that nine-tenths of the inmates of local gaols were prisoners who had been committed for terms of three months and under. It was therefore impossible to render their labour profitable except to a limited extent. Under all these circumstances, he thought he was justified in saying that instead of there being a saving of £100,000 a-year under the Bill, by the reduction of prison expenditure from £400,000 to £300,000, it was more likely that the taxpayers in a short time would be called upon to pay £500,000 or £600,000 a-year. But where was this policy to end? The claim for relief from local burdens would not be stopped by the sop given by this Bill. Probably the next demand would be that a further sum should be granted to pay the police, and the Government would yield to such demand on the condition of the police being placed under State control. The final result would be that not a single Department would be left for the local patriotism, and the local public spirit of men who were anxious to serve their country in their respective localities. Thus by gradual steps, one of the chief elements of the progress, the prosperity, and the power of Great Britain would be withdrawn, and a Conservative Government would have been a main instrument in the destruction of institutions which had so largely contributed to the welfare of the nation. In conclusion, the hon. Member moved the rejection of the Bill.

Mr. Rylands

MR. HOPWOOD, in seconding the Amendment, expressed his belief that the measure would be fatal to the institutions of the country. The ratepayers in the different localities might be supposed to consist of rich and poor together; whereas those who paid the income tax were mostly rich people, especially since the last exemptions were made by the Chancellor of the Exchequer. Therefore, burdens would be taken off those who were of the poorer sort and put upon the wealthy in the land. This was as near an approach to Communism, taught by a Conservative Government, as any lapse in political economy they had ever committed. Of course, they had heard a great deal of the principles of political economy as applied to the matter with which the Bill dealt; but how could these principles operate when the measure would, as one result of its operation, take away from the various localities all incentive to true economy? He could not but foresee much danger in the future from the fact that the Government had the power of creating an army of officials—a fact, which at a moment when the existence of a Government was endangered, would enable its members to exercise an undue, and it might be, a pernicious influence throughout the country. And he would ask, had not the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary heard any murmurs from behind him as to the manner in which the county magistracy were treated by the Bill? Had no such murmurs reached him from Lancashire—that representative county which had given him his start in official life? What the right hon. Gentleman ought to have done was to have given to the counties power to consolidate their institutions. Had he done so, he believed they would have witnessed evidence of a desire to promote true economy in all parts of the country. But while economy would not be promoted by the Bill, neither would it lead to efficiency. If the Secretary of State did not set up what might be described as a large manufacturing firm, his new system could not be profitable; and, if he did, he would have memorials and deputations time after time from those who would say that their honest industry was interfered with in the market, and that he had taken measures to render an honourable occupation a sign of punishment. With regard to the police the local authorities had ceased to be so vigilant for economy as formerly, the excuse being "Never mind, the Government pays half." There was formerly a community of feeling on both sides of the House that the institutions of the land should be upheld and maintained, but that feeling had now departed from the Government side of the House. He doubted the efficiency or the economy of the proposed change, and the only hope the right hon. Gentleman could have was that the Bill would be carried in the face of some of his most faithful Friends with the action of some from the Opposition side of the House. With respect to the question of uniformity, there was abundance of provision in the Act of 1865 to make that matter very much depend upon the will of the Secretary of State, and if he required further power, he could have obtained it from that House. With respect to the magistracy, the Bill treated them as spoiled children instead of as gentlemen who had administered the gaols of the country with great ability and at great cost of personal care and attention. Certain sops had been offered to them which he could not but think would in the olden time have been flung back to those who gave them. They ought only to limit the authority of the justices in those respects in which it might be arbitrarily exercised. The right hon. Gentleman had admitted, in answer to the Motion made by him (Mr. Hopwood) last Session, that 30,000 persons were committed to prison, not for any crime, but because they could not pay a sum of money. That number they might expect to see greatly diminished, if not entirely got rid of, by giving magistrates a merciful alternative, and so abolishing imprisonment in such cases. No man should be sent to prison when he could not pay money, but only when he refused to do so.

MR. RIDLEY said, that he was by no means one of the country magistrates whose blood, according to the hon. and learned Gentleman, had been stirred by the provisions of this Bill. So far from feeling that the class of country gentlemen to which he belonged felt in any way slighted by the measure, he intended to give it his warmest support. With regard to the magistrates of his own county (Northumberland), of whom he had the honour for a short time to be Chairman, he could state that it was their wish, as it was his own, that this Bill should become law. During the last Session he had had the honour of forwarding a Memorial from them to the Home Secretary in favour of the Bill, and he had never since seen any indication of a change of opinion on their part. He would refer to some of the objections which had been urged against the measure. It had been urged by the right hon. Member for Chester (Mr. Dodson) that this was an inadequate scheme for the improvement of our local government, that it ought to have proceeded on larger lines, and have dealt in a more comprehensive manner with the chaos of our local administration. He willingly gave credit to the Members of the late Government for having endeavoured, with the best intentions, to concoct schemes for the improvement of local government; but the lesson taught by the ambitious Bills of the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Goschen) and the right hon. Member for Halifax (Mr. Stansfeld) was that they had made the mistake of attempting to do too much. In endeavouring by such large schemes to reform our local administration they had, to a great extent, lost their chance of success. The right way of proceeding was to begin from the bottom, to go on gradually, and not to be ashamed when a Government were told that they had brought in a little measure. The hon. Member for Burnley (Mr. Rylands) said the principle of granting Imperial taxation in aid of local burdens was wrong. That principle had been, however, partially adopted by the Legislature, and without detriment to those principles of economy which ought to guide our local administration. For his part he did not see how it was possible or consistent for any Government, still less for one that entered office pledged to carry out local and administrative reforms in relief of local burdens, to resist a vote of that House, by a large majority, which had decided as to the necessity for granting Imperial relief to local burdens, where it was shown that these burdens were connected with purposes of a national character. Take, for example, the cases of prisons and lunatics. It was admitted on almost all hands that if there were a national object in aid of which Imperial taxation should be granted, it was the case of prisons. It was, however, said that Parliament ought to go further, and that the House would next be called upon to take up and altogether maintain the police. He should demur to any such proposal. The Government had now gone as far as they ought to go in relieving the local burden of police, and any proposition that they should go further in that direction would receive his most strenuous opposition. Another argument against the Bill was that it was a centralizing measure. The Prisons Bill of 1865 was, to a great extent, of a centralizing tendency, and the powers given to the Home Secretary had, as every member of the court of quarter sessions knew, centralized our prison system to an extent which was hardly ever realized. But would the hon. Members who had addressed the House in opposition to this Bill ask the Home Secretary to relax the powers granted by the Prisons Bill? If not, they were inconsistent with themselves, and would hardly convince the House that this Bill ought to be rejected on the ground of its centralizing character. The fear of excessive centralization was, no doubt, a wholesome fear, and hon. Members would do well to keep this danger before their eyes. If, however, there were undoubted advantages in a scheme of this kind, the mere name of centralization ought not to frighten them from adopting it. He attached the greatest importance to those advantages which consisted in getting rid of differences with regard to hard labour, dietary, and discipline, which enabled the Home Secretary to group together prisoners undergoing long sentences distinctly from those undergoing short ones; and also the advantage which gave the Home Secretary power to close unnecessary gaols. If he were told that these powers might be given in some other way, he would reply that the object could not be carried out by any method so practicable and so certain to answer its purpose. It would not be possible to persuade the counties to agree for these purposes, nor would it be easy in any other way to get rid of the petty jealousies which would impede any proposal for general action. He was surprised that anyone who had read the Bill should use the argument that it proposed to confiscate the property of the different local authorities. It might be that, in some instances, such as that of Hull, the local authorities might be apprehensive that the provisions of the Bill would not secure to them proper compensation for the excess accommodation they had provided; but even if that were so it was a point of detail, and the principle of the measure was not one of confiscation. The Bill assumed that local authorities had provided, or must provide, a certain amount of prison accommodation, and taking it over from them it relieved them of the liability for the future. As the liability of the authorities was undisputed, he could not see how such an arrangement could be called confiscation. Another objection urged had been that the Bill curtailed the power of visiting justices; he would have preferred to say it curtailed that of the quarter sessions, which had been in the habit of drawing up regulations that were approved by the Home Office and carried out by the visiting justices as the servants of the court of quarter sessions. The Bill would place the initiative in the Home Office, and the visiting justices would carry out its orders rather than those of the Sessions. This would put an end to an unsatisfactory state of things, under which the visiting justices found that in proposing a small alteration they were liable to the veto of the Home Office, and they would find it pleasanter to have their duties clearly defined for them. But for what was said last year by the late Lord Mayor (Mr. Cotton) he could hardly have believed that county magistrates would be aggrieved because the Bill took a little petty patronage from them. He was certain visiting justices would be as willing to discharge their duties under the proposed arrangement as they had been hitherto. The Bill was supported by a Party that attached the greatest value to Imperial relief of local burdens, and to the economy which the Home Secretary had shown would result from the measure. It was also supported by a Party that attached most value to the securing of uniformity in the discipline and management of the criminal population. Both of those principles were, he believed, perfectly sound; but, for his part, he valued the latter more than the former, and he believed the counties did so too, or they would not be bribed by the relief offered. He was not so sanguine as the Home Secretary as to the amount of saving that would be effected when the salaries of the new Commissioners and other things were taken into account; but whether the saving were much or little, he should support the Bill for the sake of the second object it would attain. It seemed to offer the best means by which we could get rid of lamentable inequalities in the management of our criminal population. He should like, if it were possible, to have the duties of visiting justices more clearly defined, and to bring them still more directly into contact with the Home Secretary apart from the Inspectors; and the case of those local authorities who had provided more accommodation than was necessary ought to be clearly provided for. Those who regarded the Bill as a centralizing measure must recede from the legislation of 1865. If the Bill passed, the present Home Office might rely with as much confidence as heretofore on the co-operation of those magistrates in whose name many objections had been urged with such little justice and such little success.

MR. KNATCHBULL-HUGESSEN said, after the two able and earnest speeches that had been made from that side of the House against the Bill, he was unwilling to vote for the second reading of the Bill without offering a brief explanation. He could not consent to mix up the merits of the Bill with the general question raised as to the manner in which the Government had dealt with the matter of local taxation. No doubt they were pledged to bring forward a large general measure; but that opinion would not prevent him supporting them when they brought forward a measure which, quite apart from its effect upon local taxation, would effect a decided improvement in the administration of the Criminal Law. The Bill of 1865 was designed to promote uniformity in the management of prisons and in the discipline and treatment of prisoners. It was essentially a Bill of consolidation and amendment, and brought into readable and workable compass provisions respecting prison management which were scattered about in a great number of different statutes. He was bound to admit that the present proposal of the Government was the logical outcome of that Act. No doubt a great deal might be said as to the danger of making advances in one direction which might logically lead them in another. He would admit that taking the prisons they were logically bound to take the police; but logic did not always obtain in politics, and there were objections of a totally different character to handing over to Government the whole police force of the country. They were going to transfer from local to Imperial taxation one particular source of expense, and the question was this—Was that, fairly speaking, a local or Imperial subject? In this point of view what could be more entirely a national or Imperial object than thief-taking and thief-guarding? If, indeed, you could localize your thieves the case would be different; if you could say “500 persons shall thief in Surrey, 2,000 in Middlesex,” and so on, there could be no reason against localizing police and prisons; but since you could not do so, of course the thieves had a great advantage, being an unlimited body, able to travel all over the country, encountered only by limited and localized bodies. An army of 20,000 men, able to move upon any point, must be more powerful than 100,000, localized in bodies of 5,000 and unable to move from their localities; and if there were no other reason against it, police as well as gaols should, no doubt, be under the central Government. But so far as the present Bill went, the reasons against it appeared to him insufficient. He had noticed that when any great measure was introduced by any Government, those who objected always applied to it one of three long words—centralization, inquisitorial, or unconstitutional. But in the 19th century they were surely not to be frightened by these grand phrases, and he would ask them to consider what the meaning of the word centralization was as applied to this measure. Centralization meant the concentration of the power which the country could bring to bear upon any point, instead of dividing and thereby weakening it. Was not that desirable in an Imperial object? It was said the Bill would paralyze all local authority. But there was a fallacy in the objection. It took for granted that there was now a representative body managing the prisons having absolute control over all expenditure, whereas the fact was that nine-tenths of the prison expenditure did not come really under the control of the magistracy. In the next place, that control was to be transferred not to a dictator, but to the Secretary of State, who was directly responsible to the House, so that, in reality, whatever power they were taking away would be taken away from the magistrates, who were officers appointed by the Crown, and responsible to nobody, and given to an officer directly responsible to the representatives of the people. He owned it would be quite different if the prisons were to be taken out of the hands of a body elected by the ratepayers; but no such body was in existence. No abuse would be tolerated by Parliament if perpetrated by the Secretary of State. The Home Secretary was very often questioned with regard to the conduct of magistrates, and if this Bill passed there would be greater facility of inquiry into abuses, and he would more readily be brought to book if he did not do what he ought to do. He did not pretend to say that the Bill was not susceptible of improvement; but he believed it would achieve the three main objects contemplated—uniformity, efficiency, and economy of prison administration. At the same time, he thought the magistrates would be placed in rather an equivocal position with reference to patronage, and it would be better, instead of giving one-half to the Visiting Justices and the other half to the Prison Commissioners, to give the whole either to one body or the other. In either case he did not believe that a single magistrate would perform his duties less efficiently than at present. The appointments by the Justices were made in the great majority of cases from the purest and best motives and having regard to the real merits of the applicants. The idea that the Secretary of State was seeking to increase his own patronage was really absurd, for no one could be conversant with official life without knowing that this kind of patronage was a thing which any Minister would be only too glad to get rid of. But the provisions of the Bill in this respect would require great care and attention, otherwise, in taking powers from one class and giving them to another, they might land themselves in confusion. With respect to the discontinuance of prisons, he wished to give to the Home Secretary a respectful but an earnest warning not to be too precipitate in closing prisons in the pursuit of economy. A year or two ago an example occurred in Kent which would aptly illustrate his meaning. The General Sessions of that county resolved to abolish the Canterbury Prison, which was small but in good order, and to repair and enlarge the Maidstone Prison, which was in a reverse condition. Immediately he (Mr. Knatchbull-Hugessen), as Chairman of the East Kent Quarter Sessions, received remonstrances from all classes in East Kent, and the result was that being supported by a large number of the East Kent magistrates he obtained the reversal of the resolution at a subsequent General Sessions. The arguments which were urged, and which came home to him, were these—that although the closing of Canterbury Prison might be proved on paper to be economical, yet there were many expenses which fell on individuals concerned in the criminal business of Quarter Sessions which were shown in no Parliamentary Return, but which would be greatly increased if they had upon every occasion to travel a much longer distance from home, and often to be away for a night or more. And if this occurred, one unexpected result might follow—namely, that people would be deterred from prosecuting, and would rather suffer from petty thefts, than incur so much expense and inconvenience. Unless, therefore, the Secretary of State consulted local feeling and exercised forbearance and discretion in closing gaols, he might actually arrive at the result of providing immunity for crime and at the same time fail in obtaining real economy. It was desirable, as far as possible, to bring justice to every man's door; and in these matters the feelings and convenience of localities should be fully considered.

MR. J. R. YORKE, in supporting the Bill, observed that it had been said that the Government were pledged to bring in a large and comprehensive measure on the subject of local taxation. He (Mr. Yorke) would rather have a small and definite grievance remedied than a large and comprehensive failure. If they compared the course of the present Government with that of the last, they found that if very slow it was very sure;

whereas the strong scheme which the last Administration originated came to signal grief. If this Bill passed this Session they would obtain a substantial instalment of a debt long due, and which ought to be discharged. There were four objects which the measure was intended to promote—economy, uniformity, efficiency, and relief to the taxpayer. His principal object in supporting the Bill was to obtain relief for the local taxpayer. He admitted that the Home Secretary would not be justified in proposing a measure of this kind solely on the ground that it would be a relief to the taxpayer; the right hon. Gentleman must show that it could be recommended on other grounds, as he did last Session, when he proved that economy, uniformity, and efficiency would be combined with that relief. Unless the right hon. Gentleman in this instance showed himself to be a very different man from what he had been in other matters he had taken in hand, there was no reason to apprehend that the sinister predictions which some had indulged in would be fulfilled. The salaries of the prison officers now amounted to £242,000, there being one officer to seven prisoners; but by this Bill half the salaries of the most highly paid would be saved, and with good management the net cost might be reduced from £285,000 to £178,000. Then, again, the extraordinary discrepancy in the cost of prisoners being £70 in one prison and £24 in another would be got rid of; and, instead of 76 county and 40 borough prisons, or one to about 200,000 persons, we should have for the future only 65 gaols, or one to every 320,000 persons. A Committee of the House of Lords recommended in 1863 that a uniform system of diet should be introduced, and in 1865 a Bill was passed with a view to carry out that recommendation. Nevertheless, it remained true that in some prisons hard labour, as the right hon. Gentleman said last year, meant a gentle walk, in others it was like the ascent of a mountain a thousand feet high. The time differed materially in different gaols, and the quantity of stone to be broken was exactly double in one gaol to what it was in another. In some places prisoners had their work separately, in others the separate system was not adopted. Unproductive labour was believed in some prisons to be more deterrent, in others not. No doubt, as Mr. Baker thought, different experiments ought to be conducted without the authority of the Visiting Justices. But magistrates had been occupied many years with these matters. They had exhausted the experiment stage of the question, and were now in the scientific. As to the question of relief to the local ratepayer, it should be observed that his position as compared with the taxpayer had materially deteriorated, for during the last 20 years, while 10 per cent had been added to the taxes, 100 per cent, more or less, had been added to the rates; and while £14,000,000 had been taken off the taxes, not one shilling up to the time the present Government came into office had been taken off the local burdens. In the first Session of the present Parliament, however, relief was given in the matter of the expense for police and lunatics, and there remained now the strongest case for relief, that of the liability for the administration of justice. He could hardly conceive any claim on the Exchequer stronger, for not only was the Government bound to defend us from foreign foes, but also to render life and property secure in the country, and it was not real property that was so much threatened by the dishonest as personal. It was curious to consider the system of justice in this country. Apparently, it was most simple, and connected by one leading idea. The Queen was the fountain of justice, which was administered in her name, writs were issued in her name, and all Civil officers, from the Lord Chancellor down to the Sheriff's officers, acted in her name. But when we came to consider the way in which the expenses were paid, the contrast to this theoretic uniformity was most striking. We had one anomalous distribution of cost between the Treasury and the localities. The Judges were paid by the Exchequer; the Coroners by the local rates; the expenses of prosecutions were shared between individuals, the Treasury, and the county; prisoners were maintained before conviction by the localities, and after conviction by the Imperial Exchequer; and the police were maintained partly by the one and partly by the other. He thought he had shown some reason for holding that no excuse whatever was needed for the claim put forth by the ratepayer on the Exchequer. We had heard a great deal about the price to be paid for the advantages which the Bill would confer, and a great deal had been said about interfering with local self-government. In his opinion, however, the evils likely to arise from this interference were very shadowy. He agreed with the right hon. Gentleman who had last spoken that you could not properly talk of local institutions unless you spoke of such as were administered by persons who were elected; but the magistrates were not an elected body, they were appointed by the Crown through the Lord Chancellor. Some would say this was the thin end of the wedge. The police were virtually the servants of the Home Secretary, though the counties had to pay half the cost. The limits of pay were determined in London, and the Chief Constable, though appointed by the magistrates at Quarter Sessions, was not removable by them. Then, again, the police had no common action; they were in isolated bodies all over the country, so that it was difficult to arrange any satisfactory system of promotion and superannuation, and there was also the difficulty of jurisdiction in dealing with offenders. In the not very distant future he hoped, therefore, that some further concession would be made in the matter of the police. Returning to the Bill, he regarded it as a step towards a simplification of the power of the magistrates in time to come, and also as a step towards the constitution—which, he hoped, was not very remote—of County Financial Boards. He had always considered that the present position of the magistrates in dealing with the money of the ratepayers was alike anomalous and indefensible, and a real safeguard to local institutions would be a County Board, either composed entirely of elective members, or, as he should prefer, with a proportion of magistrates sitting ex officio. If such Boards were empowered also to deal with sanitary matters, education, and other questions now intrusted to Boards of Guardians, it would be possible to constitute provincial assemblies, which would not only exercise these functions most usefully, but would also relieve the Government in London from a vast amount of harassing details and correspondence. If this Bill, as he believed, would promote economy and efficiency; if it would give an instalment of the debt which had long been owing to local ratepayers; and if it did not, as he believed, give rise to the dangers which had been apprehended, he thought it should receive general support, and trusted it would speedily pass during the present Session.

SIR HARCOURT JOHNSTONE said, he could not but express his surprise that so much time had already been wasted in discussing a Bill which was evidently very desirable. At the Quarter Sessions of his county the Bill had been received with absolute unanimity, because it carried out the recommendations of the Lords' Committee of 1863, made for the sake of securing greater economy and efficiency of administration. Referring to the case of Scarborough, which had been recently mentioned in the newspapers, he said there was no truth in the absurd statement that the people of Scarborough desired any exceptional legislation because they were exceptionally "respectable." They only felt somewhat aggrieved on local grounds connected with the prison there, but they were not in the least likely to get exceptional legislation, and had never asked for it. As to the Bill, he believed it was perfectly safe in the hands of the Home Secretary. Last year there had been a large majority in favour of the measure which was then introduced on the subject; and yet the old bugbears and phantoms—centralization, for instance—with which all the Members of the House must be familiar had again been conjured up. Notwithstanding what had been said, however, he trusted and believed that the Bill would have a speedy passage through the House.

MR. W. S. STANHOPE said, that the Bill which was now under discussion did not materially differ from the measure which had been presented to Parliament last year; but the alterations which the present Bill exhibited, as compared with its predecessor, were, in his opinion, improvements. If it passed, it would, in its operation, remove a great many difficulties in the working of prison regulations, expenses, and other matters. Objections had been raised as to the way in which the duties of the visiting justices would be affected by the Bill; but he thought that, in practice, it might be expected that those duties would be very much what they had hitherto been. It was quite clear that neither the present

Home Secretary nor any one who might succeed him in the office which he held would be able to get on without the assistance of the local justices in the management of the prisons; and having been for a considerable time chairman of the visiting justices of Wakefield Gaol, where they had more than 1,400 prisoners, he knew these local justices were more directly under the supervision of the right hon. Gentleman, and more immediately responsible to the Home Office, than they were to the Quarter Sessions. Should County Boards be henceforth established, a difficulty might arise between them and the magistrates on the subject of prison expenditure, but if the Bill became law the cause of it would be removed. In Committee he hoped that the measure would be amended in regard to the visiting justices having to report upon the repairs necessary, or a large amount of circumlocution would be incurred. In all large prisons repairs could be better done by the justices than by a central office. At the same time, he thought a great benefit would result to the ratepayers, in that it would render more uniform the way in which the burden should be borne by the different classes of persons on whom it was laid, for he saw no reason why those persons who derived their incomes from funded property should not contribute towards the costs of prisoners. He wished to express his opinion in favour of the employment of prisoners upon industrial labour. Nothing could be said in defence of what might be described as purely penal labour—such as the treadmill, the crank, shot drill, and punishments of a similar character, and the justices with whom he had been associated in connection with Wakefield Gaol had for many years entirely disapproved of labour of such a description, and were of opinion it should be abolished. Work of that kind acted unequally upon criminals, and was, in many instances, dangerous to health. The sturdy ruffians sentenced to it thought nothing of it as a punishment, and the weakly prisoners who were subject to heart disease suffered in their health by such punishment. Not only so, but it was liable to this objection—that such a form of labour often tended to disgust the criminal and to make him declare that as soon as he got out of prison he would not do another day's work if he could help it. Let them, however, put such a man to an industrious occupation while he was in gaol, and they would not only train him to useful work, which he might follow when he regained his liberty, but they would make him of service in reducing the expenditure of the prison during the period of his incarceration. It did not follow that because a man happened to be a criminal he should be kept in idleness, and at Wakefield they preferred employing them in useful labour—in doing the repairs and alterations necessary in the gaol, and other things which produced a profitable result. Objections had been raised to the employment of prisoners in industrial and productive labour, on the ground that such labour would enter into unfair competition with various trades conducted outside prisons. He could not agree with this, because, in the first place, it did not follow that the labour of one man necessarily ousted the labour of another; and in the second, the magistrates could have no object in under-selling any trade. No doubt complaints were sometimes made against them, and specific cases might be brought forward when goods had to be sold at low prices; but it should be borne in mind that, in this matter, they were dealing not with willing, but with unwilling workers, and that in every prison there must be a quantity of bad material produced which had to be sold for what it would fetch. There were some other points of detail in reference to which he thought the Bill capable of improvement, and which he hoped to see effected in Committee; but, on the whole, he was of opinion that the measure would prove beneficial to the country both as regarded the interest of the ratepayers and as tending to promote a more efficient and uniform administration of our gaols, and he hoped the House would give its assent to the second reading.

DR. KENEALY said, he should not oppose the second reading of the Bill, because he thought there was a general opinion in the House in favour of legislation on the subject. There were, however, some points in reference to which he had an objection, and upon which he thought Amendments might be made. In the first place, he thought the powers proposed to be given by the Bill were too dictatorial in character; and in the second, he was of opinion that the Governing Bodies proposed to be constituted should be called upon to make such Reports as would enable Parliament to take action in reference to possible abuses of the internal management of prisons. It was all very well for Prison Inspectors to report to the Secretary of State, who probably pigeon-holed the document as soon as he got it. The Report should be presented to Parliament, so that hon. Members might have an opportunity of knowing what was going on. He had taken the liberty of calling the attention of the right hon. Gentleman the other evening to certain prison regulations which, in his opinion, ought to be altered in the way of amendment, and he now respectfully pressed upon him the necessity of repealing all existing prison rules and framing fresh ones altogether. Under our present prison system most tyrannical proceedings were permitted, which, if generally known, would excite great public indignation. Thus prisoners were frequently masked and manacled, and had heavy weights, such as cannon balls, chained to their legs as a punishment for having violated some trifling prison rule; while others were flogged if they committed the slightest breach of discipline, and this, in his opinion, was a disgrace to the country. He had waited with anxiety to see whether any of the so-called Humanitarian Party in the House would come forward on behalf of these unfortunate beings, many of whom were doubtless guilty, but a large proportion of whom were the victims of circumstances, who deserved commiseration, and who would, if treated differently, be converted into good members of society; but he regretted to find that their wrongs were passed by unnoticed. Many of the prisoners were flogged, were subjected to long terms of solitary confinement, and were fed upon bread and water for similar offences. He found from Returns that between July, 1864, and March, 1871, no fewer than 1,398 prisoners had been flogged by order of the Visiting Justices. Surely that was a circumstance requiring investigation, especially when it was remembered that all these transactions were concealed under the present system, and were unknown to the general public, as the prisoners were absolutely forbidden to make known to the outside world any of the tyrannies to which they were subjected. Notwithstanding the vigilance exercised by the Home Secretary, there were officials who delighted to inflict torture on those of their fellow-creatures who happened to be in their power. It might seem an extraordinary theory to propound, but he certainly considered that flogging ought only to be imposed after full investigation in Court before a jury. So-called philanthropists looked upon prisoners as men who, having raised their hands against other men, deserved to have other men's hands raised against them; but if an entirely opposite system were adopted—one of love, kindness, and gentleness—it would be much more effective. He would therefore suggest that in future no prisoner should be flogged without having been tried by a jury and sentenced to that punishment by a Court of Law, that no prisoner should be subjected to solitary confinement for a longer period than 12 hours at a time, and that no prisoner should be fed upon bread and water or be compelled to drag about heavy weights chained to his legs. The effect of these cruel punishments was to harden and confirm in guilt rather than to soften and reform, while they were liable to the grossest abuse at the hands of bad men who sometimes got into office, and who exercised their great power tyrannically. Some alteration should also be made in the regulation forbidding complaints to be made by prisoners to their relatives and friends, for the mouth of a person ought not to be sealed simply because he was a prisoner. He ought not to be debarred from acquainting his friends with the hardship he was suffering; he was not likely to invent falsehoods for the mere pleasure of inventing them. Provision might also be made for prisoners who fell into a state of ill-health. If the medical officer considered that the ill-health was not sufficient to justify a change of treatment, the prisoner ought to be allowed to be visited by a doctor in whom his friends had confidence, and whose recommendations should be attended to. The rules as to the visits of relatives and the writing of letters might be judiciously relaxed, as the more frequently a prisoner was brought into contact with the outside world the more powerful would be the humanizing effect upon him. Under the present system prisoners were only allowed to be visited twice a-year, and then only for 20 minutes at a time, but he proposed that the number of times they might be visited should be increased to four, and the duration of each visit extended to one hour, because he believed that these interviews, with their mothers, their wives, their sisters, and their children, tended to humanize rather than to debase them. Placing him behind iron bars to be gazed at by his friends was reducing him to the level of a wild beast, and with treatment like this was it to be wondered at that, on his release, he acted like a beast rather than a human being? These were alterations which were consistent with the ordinary feelings of humanity, and he trusted that the Home Secretary would find himself able to adopt them.

SIR WILLIAM FRASER said, they had heard much in that debate of the rights and duties of visiting justices; he hoped the rights, powers, and privileges confirmed by the Act of 1865, with respect to the visitation of prisons, to those justices who were not on the visiting committee, and whose services in examining what went on in prisons would be all the more valuable, because their visits of inspection were unexpected, would be strictly preserved. In the county of Middlesex there was a very large number of magistrates and also of prisons, and he hoped the point to which he had just referred would not be overlooked. He also trusted the important point would be made clear whether magistrates had a right, which they ought to have, of visiting the police cells of the metropolis and prisons of first instance—that was to say, the houses of detention, with a view to the careful supervision of the treatment received by the inmates. Different systems of discipline, varying much in their degree of severity, had been adopted in the prisons of this country; but when the power was more concentrated and vested to a great extent in the Home Secretary, on the whole, greater justice would be done to prisoners. Uncertainty and inequality of treatment were more intolerable in a free country than strictness even to severity; such uncertainty and inequality had to many minds the appearance of injustice, a thing which it was desirable to avoid as much as possible. Allusion had been made to the hardships and indignities inflicted upon convicts in respect to the visits of their relatives and friends: it was a hardship that prisoners, on the rare occasions when they were allowed to see their friends, should be exposed to any degradation that was not absolutely unavoidable. In these days of mechanical contrivance, it surely could not be difficult or unduly expensive to make arrangements in most prisons by which a few moments of privacy could, without danger, be given to prisoners when they were visited by their friends. A prisoner ought also to have something to look forward to, if he was not to sink into hopeless and inveterate criminality. Moreover, it was most important to maintain a distinction both in name and in condition between a house of detention and a prison. Shakespeare had made a very young lady ask, "What's in a name?" but he was far too sensible a man not to know that there was a very great deal in a name. If a man were put into a house of detention, he would not be so degraded in his own and in other people's estimation when he came out as he would be if he came out of a prison. He knew of places in which persons who were detained on remand or for trial were treated just the same as convicted prisoners, excepting in regard to hard labour. That he conceived to be an injustice, for until the sentence was passed the accused was, in the eye of the law, innocent. In conclusion, he thought measures like the present one were wise and practical, and thoroughly appreciated by the country. Happily, the times had changed since we had only one philanthropist. On the tomb of John Howard, in St. Paul's, were inscribed the words—"He trod an open, but unfrequented path to immortality." Howard was not only a very benevolent man, but a man of consummate practical sagacity; and he taught the world the lesson that a man may be benevolent without being a fool. It was extremely gratifying to find a Conservative Government endeavouring to carry measures conceived in the spirit in which this Bill had been framed. He was very glad indeed that the measure had been introduced by the Home Secretary and his Colleagues, for nothing could tend more to honest and just popularity than these philanthropic reforms.

SIR SYDNEY WATERLOW said, he would admit that the present condition of the small county and borough prisons could not be regarded as altogether satisfactory, and also that there

there is no real necessity for abandoning the existing system, and that the system is susceptible of improvement. When I ventured to address a few observations to the House on the introduction of the Bill, the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Home Department said, "You made the same speech in 1865." I am not aware that I spoke on the Bill of 1865; but I believe that the tenour of the few observations which I made on the Prisons Bill, when it was last year introduced into the House, were very much in accordance with the opinions I am about to express. I was gratified in 1865 by seeing that the constitution of the county and borough prisons, and their management, was preserved, by that Act of 1865, although great changes were made in the detail of administration. I wish the House to understand how great a change the right hon. Gentleman is now proposing. By the Act of 1865, 14 of the smaller gaols were closed, and why should not a similar proposal be adopted now? By that Act the local jurisdiction of the magistrates was preserved, and instead of making over the large sphere of the administration of justice which prison discipline and management comprehend to the arbitrary, and it may be the capricious discretion of the Home Secretary, the rules for prison discipline were incorporated in the Act of 1865, and were specifically enacted by Parliament, so that inmates of the gaols of England are, as much as the people of England, governed by law, and not by an authority delegated to a Member of the Executive Government. In this there is the recognition of a great constitutional principle. I could have understood the right hon. Gentleman if he had said,—“Give me discretionary power for a time, until I can make rules such as may command the confidence of Parliament, and thus be enacted;” but the right hon. Gentleman proposes, under this Bill, to take for himself and his successors an unlimited discretionary power in the administration of justice. For prison discipline under the modern system has become more than ever part of the administration of justice, and that is one reason why I regard as dangerous the principles of this Bill. If, Sir, there are too many gaols, there is no reason why the smaller ones should not be suppressed in the same manner as 14 were suppressed in the year 1865. If this is to be done, let it be done specifically by statute, and if the right hon. Gentleman wishes to exercise discretion, the House might allow him two or three years, which will probably be the full extent of his occupancy of office, for suppressing small prisons and for the framing of the rules to govern the rest; but if he has any confidence in himself, if he has any confidence in his Party, if he has any confidence in being able to effect good and useful alterations in the present system, why does he not propose the general outline of his intended action now? Why do I say that the administration of prison discipline has become a part of the administration of justice? It is perfectly well known with respect to the separate system of imprisonment, that, when that system was adopted in many of the gaols of the country, I believe in all the convict prisons, so grievous was the unmitigated pressure of that system found to be upon the mind, so overpowering upon the minds of many prisoners, that it became necessary to give some authority power to limit the period, as well as the application of that system. I hope the House will forgive me if I allude for one moment to experience of my own. More than 30 years ago I went to the United States, where I was privileged to see the first application of the separate system in the prison of Philadelphia. I do not know how the permission was granted to me, but I had it, and I must say that anything so dreadful as what I there saw, I have never since witnessed. The system was being applied in excess, and I saw both black and white men, prisoners, in almost every stage of moral and mental decomposition. The system was subsequently introduced into this country, and I resisted it, in conjunction with some of the Warwickshire and most of the Middlesex justices of the peace, and we succeeded in preventing its application, until the necessity for modifying its application had been ascertained by experience in this country, just as it had been ascertained by experience in the United States. So that I do not speak altogether as a novice on the question when I contend that in the application of this system some person or persons in authority must have the power not only of modifying the application, but of regulating the period of the application of this system; and, if that power must be exercised, then I say that this interference forms a part of the administration of justice which reaches the gaols of the country, and that the proper persons to be entrusted with the regulation of the ordinary gaols are the local magistrates. I know that the county and borough justices are lightly spoken of by certain persons; yet if there be any instance of abuse in their administration, if there is any instance of cruelty or injustice, I ask you, Mr. Speaker, whether there are not always found Members in this House, who, like the hon. Member for Leicester (Mr. P. A. Taylor)—and I honour him for what he has done in this respect—are prompt to bring the conduct of such magistrates under the attention of this House? Do not tell me that, because the county and borough magistrates are not elected, they are therefore irresponsible. They are always liable to dismissal by the same authority that appointed them, the Lord Chancellor. They have been made practically responsible by this House; for if any magistrate has committed any excess or abuse of power, Members in this House have shown themselves ready to appeal to the Lord Chancellor for that magistrate's dismissal. I repeat, then, do not tell me that the magistrates are irresponsible. Among the younger Members of this House in the present day there seems to be strange confusion. They appear to think that no institution can be national, the conduct and expenditure of which are not immediately subject to the Executive Government. According to this theory the Established Church is not a national institution. These Members speak of the county magistrates, as if they were not representative, because they are not elected. Will they tell the country that the House of Lords is not representative, because it is not elective? Will they accept the vulgar delusion that the House of Lords represents nothing but a certain number of acres and houses possessed by the Peers, and fails to represent the higher intelligence of this country? Sir, it pains me to hear among those who call themselves Conservatives, politicians, junior to myself, fathering delusions, which on the present occasion, I am glad to find the Radicals in this House are ashamed to utter, and practically disown.

It is gratifying to see the Radical Members of this House rising in their places to defend great constitutional principles, which secure the freedom of the people of this country. The House will forgive me if I am travelling in too wide a sphere; but you may depend upon this, that representative institutions are not only those which are elective. It is impossible that men having a stake, and who reside in certain localities, should exercise public administrative functions in their own neighbourhoods without feeling the pressure of the public opinion of those neighbourhoods; and this is the meaning of local government being described as self-government. It matters not whether the administrator be elected or not; if he is fixed to a locality, he must feel and be influenced by the pressure of the opinion of that locality. The danger arises from this, that, if you extend the sphere of his action too widely, you dissipate the pressure of local opinion. In the multiplicity of functions that are heaped upon Home Secretaries they escape this kind of responsibility, and in this lies the reason for their being sometimes charged with neglect. They are unable to perform all the offices they undertake themselves, and are obliged to delegate the exercise of them to subordinates, and thus evade the responsibility that ought to rest upon themselves. Now, this is the process of dissipating responsibility which you are engaged in furthering by means of this Bill for the supersession of the local government of the country in the matter of prison management and discipline. I say, then, that this is a Radical Bill in the worst sense of the term, for it is a radical change in the direction of virtually irresponsible and despotic power, and I stand with the Radical Members of this House as firmly as any of them in protesting against the despotic tendencies of this measure. I am sorry to say that among junior Conservatives there appears to be a leaning towards principles which have been condemned during the best period of the history of this country. In the exercise of the wide hospitality of this country we receive ex-Potentates and their families; we have received ex-Presidents of Republics and their families; but these ex-Presidents have generally come here poor; we receive ex-Emperors and ex-Empresses, and ex-Kings and ex-Queens, but they have generally come here rich—at all events, they have a position in society which I am afraid tends to impregnate the higher classes with an undue toleration of—if not an inclination towards—those despotic practices which have been occasions for the ousting of these ex-Potestates, ex-Emperors, and ex-Kings from their former countries. Now, when I read this Bill—a Bill which I little expected from the present Home Secretary—I do not think that the apprehensions with which the Royal Titles Bill was regarded by hon. Gentlemen opposite, suspicions shared by myself, were so groundless as my hon. Friends near described them. The fact is that this Bill is a direct invasion of the Common Law of this country, and I am prepared to prove it. The Common Law of this country—the chief source and guardian of our orderly freedom—grew out of local administration. I might quote Lord Coke, Mr. Justice Blackstone, and Lord Hale to prove this. But, Sir, there is not a lawyer in or out of the House that would dispute the proposition that the Common Law is founded upon the local customs of this country. With the permission of the House, however, there is one authority upon the subject whom I should like to quote. I hold in my hand an extract from the works of M. de Tocqueville, whom I believe to be the highest French authority upon constitutional questions. A work of his on "The Ancien Regime in France," was translated and published by the Conservative publisher, Mr. Murray, in 1865. And what does M. de Tocqueville say while comparing the laws of France with those of England? He writes of the Common Law and Courts of England—

"The power which nations possess of prospering, in spite of the imperfections to be met with in secondary portions of their institutions, so long as the general principles and the actual spirit which animate those institutions are full of life and vigour, is a phenomenon which manifests itself with peculiar distinctness when the judicial constitution of England in the last century, as described by Blackstone, is looked into."

Mind you, this was the constitution of England unreformed—that is, unreformed in the modern sense, of which the proposal now before the House is an example. He says there was a wonderful diversity of law—

"In England itself may be found four kinds of law—the common law, statute law, canon law, and equity."

Then, what does he say of the administration of justice in England, with all this diversity, which the right hon. Gentleman says cannot longer be endured, still preserving the great principle of the Common Law? He says this—

"These blemishes were very great; and if the enormous old machine of the English judicial system be compared with the modern construction of that of France, and the simplicity, consistence, and natural convexity to be observed in the latter, with the remarkable complication and incoherence of the former, the errors of the English jurisprudence will appear greater still."

M. de Tocqueville had just been ejected from France by a despotic coup d'état. He was here in England, ejected from his own country, which by one revolution had destroyed a Constitutional Government, and by another revolution had within four years seen the Republic of 1848 supplanted by a despotism. He was in a temper, therefore, to inquire how it was that, at that period of European crisis, England was able to stand so firm? And what is his observation on this? Notwithstanding all this diversity, this complexity, this multiplicity of jurisdiction, he says—

"There is not a country in the world in which, in the words of Blackstone, the great ends of justice are more completely attained than in England—that is to say, no country in which every man, whatever his condition of life, whether he appeared in Court as a common individual or a prince, was more sure of being heard, or found in the tribunals of this country better guarantees for the defence of his property, his liberty, and his life."

Now, it is a part of this system which we are asked by the present Bill to break up in favour of a centralized system like that of France. The Swiss have a very varied system of prison discipline, like our own. It is no more uniform than the system which exists in England; but they have only one criminal to every 1,200 of the population; whereas, if you turn to France, with its exact uniformity, and its centralization, you will find one criminal in every 600 of the population. The proportion of criminals to population in England is smaller even than that of Switzerland. This brings me to refer to another part of the English system. Hitherto, though not unmodified, in principle the administration of justice in this country has been non-political. The magistrate is a judicial officer, and is not appointed in deference to, and is usually free from the bias of political considerations. He is, I repeat, a judicial officer; but by this Bill you take the whole of that portion of the administration of justice which, as I have shown, now extends throughout prison discipline, under your modern system; you take the judicial system from the Lord Chancellor, a Judge, who is the superior of the magistrates, and give it to the Secretary of State, who is a political officer. That is another ground upon which I object to this Bill; but I object to it on other grounds. Colonel Ducane and other gentlemen of the Civil Service go to Social Science meetings, and there they impugn the conduct and vilify the unpaid magistracy of the country. Those gentlemen say that there is greater uniformity of administration in the convict prisons than in the county and borough prisons, and the discipline in all prisons ought to be equally uniform. Is that to be expected? The occupants of convict gaols are selected prisoners. They are long-sentence men, and it is easy to adopt an absolute, or nearly absolute, uniformity of discipline for them, when it would be impossible, even if it were desirable, to adopt that absolute uniformity of discipline among prisoners sentenced for a variety of periods with whom the justices have to deal in the county and borough gaols. I appeal to the experience of every magistrate in this House whether this is not the fact; and yet we are taunted with a want of uniformity like that in the convict prisons, and with not carrying out a system which is totally inapplicable in many of these cases. Again, I say, that this Bill puts an end to the great and useful legal distinction which still exists between felons and other classes of prisoners, the treatment of the most heinous and less culpable offenders. The term "felon," in its original sense, was applied to that class of offenders who were afterwards transported, and are now termed convicts. The felon was an outlaw, and the convict was transported; and during the period of his sentence became an outlaw. In my opinion no greater mischief was ever done to this country than by the abolition of the system of transportation. The abolition of transportation may have been a boon to some of the colonies; but it was an injury to the mother-country, and an injury to the convicts themselves; for I defy you to give a convict the opportunity of amendment in the mother-country, where you are obliged to guard him against his old associates in crime by a stern system of restraint, that you could give him if you sent him to the colonies, where he would have a much fairer chance of amendment. It is a great misfortune that the system was abolished; it was proved, in the case of a person who desired to be admitted to a seat in this House, whilst still under a sentence of transportation, that he was an outlaw. It is a wholesome distinction that compelled you to deal differently with convicts who have been guilty of the more serious offences and sentenced to long terms of imprisonment, and with prisoners sentenced to short periods—the distinction between county and borough gaols and the convict prisons. But under this Bill you are going to abolish the wholesome distinction which has hitherto existed between these different classes of prisons. If, however, you mean to remedy that defect, which will be created by this Bill, it can only be, as the hon. Member opposite (Mr. Hopwood) pointed out, by the establishment of Bridewells and Houses of Detention. You are about to abolish all the small gaols; but you will have to create a substitute for short-sentenced prisoners. You will have to enlarge your police stations, or else build Houses of Detention, and where will then be the boasted economy of this Bill? The right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary has proposed this measure with a double object. On the one hand, he desired to gratify those who clamour for the remission of local taxation, and if possible make his concessions in that direction fit into a reform of the whole system of prison administration. The consequence of this two-fold attempt is the introduction of an arbitrary measure in violation of the constitutional law of the country, which, but for the clamour raised by Chambers of Agriculture and others, I do not believe the right hon. Gentleman would ever have attempted to lay on the Table. I hope the House will excuse the observations which I have made. They convey, I conceive, distinct fundamental objections to the Bill and to its principles. I would say further that I think the clause in this

Bill upon which the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary relies—the clause providing for the appointment of the visiting committee of the magistrates who he intends should take the place of the visiting justices—would place any magistrate who may accept the post in a false position with the court of quarter sessions, for whoever accepts this function will cease to be a magistrate like his brother magistrates, while not ceasing to be a justice of the peace, he will become the instrument of another power. In fact, his position will become utterly ambiguous. He will not sit in the court of which he is a member like the other members of that court. He must be either their superior or their suspect. The right hon. Gentleman says that he cannot dispense with the assistance of the visiting justices; but he is about to supersede them by instruments he is about to select from the courts of quarter sessions. The reports of these instruments are to be made to him, not to the court of quarter sessions; he will receive reports from individual justices instead of the collective reports of the courts which now reach him through their chairman. I hope the House will excuse me for having thus detained them in stating the objections which I entertain to this Bill. But, before I conclude, there is yet one other objection to which I would direct attention. The reformatory system in this country began in my own county. For 16 years I subscribed to a reformatory before any Act of Parliament was passed on the subject, and I do not know that in any part of England an institution of the sort was founded earlier than in Warwickshire. We had power to commit to a reformatory school, we had only to find the means of establishing a reformatory school—we did this by private subscription; and when you tell me that there has been no improvement in prison discipline originated or carried out by the county justices, I ask you to look at this fact—that the reformatory system in this country was founded by us, despised and condemned justices of the peace, and of this my own county presents the first example. If you separate completely the prison system from the judicial system of the magistracy, you will build a wall against the improvements, such as we have hitherto been enabled to carry out, and instead of our being able to empty the prisons, you shall fill them. These full prisons may be administered by officers of the central authority all clad in blue, according to a rigid system of uniformity; but you risk the contentment of the people which has hitherto been assured under the ancient constitutional system of local self-government, which made every man to feel that he would be tried, and, if need be, punished, not only by his peers, but by men who were responsible to his neighbours and their neighbours for their conduct; but if, by means of this measure, you substitute a central system, you will in the end succeed in doing this—you will centralize discontent, and thus enter upon a system which has proved the fruitful source of convulsion in France.

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON said, he was sure his hon. Friend the Member for North Warwickshire (Mr. Newdegate), earnest as he was upon every subject in which he took an interest, had no need to apologize to the House for having suggested the views he had just laid before them, but he could not help congratulating the Radical Members below the Gangway opposite, as his hon. Friend had called them, on the accession to their ranks of a very powerful ally. His hon. Friend had stated what he (Sir Henry Selwin-Ibbetson) could not, for the life of him, perceive—namely, that the Bill was an interference with the Common Law of the country. On the contrary, it was an interference merely with the government of the prisons of the country, which was regulated by statute law. He did not think that another of the views of his hon. Friend would find favour with his new allies below the Gangway, for not only was it a matter of absolute political necessity, but it was a matter of mere justice to those citizens of the United Kingdom who had gone to found our colonies, that transportation was abolished. They had had a speech from the hon. Baronet the Member for Maidstone (Sir Sydney Waterlow), who was, perhaps, the only Member who had spoken who had travelled in respect of the Bill out of the history of last Session. The hon. Baronet's suggestion to divide England into circuit districts, and regulate prisons on that plan, though he might have given some attention to the matter, had not been sufficiently worked out, because he (Sir Henry Selwin-Ibbetson) ventured to think that the hon. Baronet had not considered the difficulties, quarrels, and jealousies which must ensue from that system. The whole idea on which the hon. Baronet founded his system was that the present Acts could be so supplemented as to be made perfectly suitable to carry out the objects to effect which the present Bill was brought before the House. Those objects were—economy in management, the reform of criminals by industrial employment, and the relief of local burdens. He (Sir Henry Selwin-Ibbetson) asked whether the Act of 1865, having been passed for those objects, had afforded sufficient encouragement to the Home Secretary by the way in which it had been carried out, to make them think that by merely taking further powers they would attain the end they all had in view? The Bill of 1865, while helping the authorities in the localities, laid down a system of rules which were to be sanctioned by the Secretary of State, in which the mode of governing the prisons was to be sanctioned as regarded diet, discipline, and other matters of administration. Power was also given for the removal of prisoners from one prison to another. But what had been the result? The local magistrates throughout the country were not of one mind, and the rules so sanctioned were not carried into effect; and under the present system a period of four years must elapse before the Secretary of State could compel action whenever the prison authorities refused to carry out the rules. The Bill would remedy that, and moreover, would bring about an immense saving. The hon. Baronet the Member for Maidstone had said that under the present system economy would not be secured, and he referred to three Government prisons in which the net cost of maintenance averaged something like £35 a-head. But the hon. Baronet left out of his calculation a statement which he ought to have made. He ought to have told the House that the prisons managed by Government had a much larger proportion of officers than those not under its control; and the cost of maintenance in the various prisons he took as examples showed that that if all the local authorities in England had only followed out the principle by which such economy was arrived at there would have been no need for the present Bill. Convincing as the figures the hon. Baronet quoted appeared to be, they were not absolutely flawless, for if he had gone a little further he would have found them refuted. He had only to turn to the county prison of Leicestershire, where the cost per prisoner was £42 13s. 1d.; to that of Stamford, where it was £69; or to that of Nottingham, where it was £46, to find this verified. He mentioned those facts to show that the argument from figures was not perfectly reliable. The hon. Member for North Warwickshire urged that if the Bill passed the Secretary of State could set aside the rules which were made by the statute. That was not so; those rules would remain as enacted in 1865. The power the Secretary of State took was the power possessed by the prison authority—namely, the quarter sessions. That power might supplement the rules laid down by the statute by regulations framed for the visiting justices, and the power to make such regulations was now proposed to be transferred to the Secretary of State; but all the safeguards provided by the Act of 1865 remained. The hon. Member for North Warwickshire had asked, would not the magistrates be despised and condemned if they worked under the system to be established under this Bill?

MR. NEWDEGATE: I said that their position would be despised and disregarded as an independent authority.

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON said, he had misunderstood his hon. Friend, but he must say from his own experience as a magistrate that he could not believe that men who performed the duties of justices—acting from the motives which actuated them—would be at all influenced by such an idea. He did not believe that men who voluntarily visited lunatic asylums under much the same condition of things would be placed in any such degraded position as the hon. Member had asserted they would be by acting under the powers of this Bill. So far from the visiting justices sustaining any loss of dignity, the Home Secretary must depend upon them for the maintenance and working of the prisons throughout the country. The duties of the visiting justices would be almost identical with their present functions. They would be the guardians of the prisoners and their protectors against any injustice, cruelty, and wrong that might be done to them. They would then as now also have to administer the rules laid down by the Secretary of State; and they would, in fact, have the supervision of the prisons subject to the authority of the Home Secretary, the only difference being that they would report to the Secretary of State instead of to the quarter sessions. He believed, also, that they would have the same authority over prison discipline when the Bill became law as they possessed at the present moment. In all matters of urgent necessity the visiting justices would have to act, and he doubted not but that they would work as well and as willingly with the Home Office as they did at present. As to the question of patronage, he agreed with those hon. Members who combated the idea of handing it over to the Government, as they alleged this Bill proposed to do. But that was not the case. The nomination of officers to be employed would remain, as at present, with the local authorities, the only difference being, that under the Bill all appointments would be subject to the control of the Secretary of State for the Home Department. The officials would become civil servants, and would be members of a general prison staff, to be employed and promoted as they deserved in any of the prisons of the country. It would be impossible to work such a system as this without a general plan of promotion, and by it the present system would be made more efficient. Several hon. Members who addressed the House said the Bill would have the effect of handing over or confiscating the property in the prisons. But that also was a mistake. By the Bill the prisons would remain, as they now were, nominally the property of the Crown, and the relief the Government proposed to give was simply that of the expenditure of the gaol. The Bill did not relieve the local authorities from their original obligation to provide the prisons, in the first instance, and the only change would be that as long as the prison continued to be used as such, so long would it remain in the name of the Home Secretary as trustee for that county. For his own part, he believed the Bill to be a good one, and that it would do that justice to local taxation so long demanded at the hands of that House. He believed that it was the outcome of the Prisons Bill of 1865, and he believed also that by it the Home Secretary would be able to carry into effect a better classification as to labour, and by increasing industrial labour it would do much to diminish crime in the future. He could not believe that when a man had been taught a trade in prison he would not in many cases attempt to gain an honest living when he came out. He believed that the magistrates would work well under the Home Secretary, and that the Bill would be a lasting testimony to the ability of his right hon. Friend who now filled that office.

MR. CHAMBERLAIN said, he would venture to trouble the House with a few observations with regard to the measure, because the position of the constituency he represented was somewhat different from all those which had been hitherto referred to. Other hon. Members had considered it from the point of one local authority, but in Birmingham two local authorities would be unseated by the measure. Not only would the visiting justices be deprived of the management and control of the prisons which they now enjoyed, but the town council would also be deprived of its control over the financial affairs connected with the gaol. He confessed that he was not at all surprised at the fact that there should be considerable difference of opinion on both sides of the House in respect to the measure. He could sympathize with those divergencies of opinion, for he himself was divided between admiration for the objects which the Home Secretary had in view, and dissatisfaction with regard to the means by which the right hon. Gentleman hoped to achieve his end. He rejoiced, however, with regard to this division of opinion, that it had had the result of securing to them the eloquent advocacy of his hon. Friend the Member for North Warwickshire (Mr. Newdegate.) If he understood the objects which the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary had in view, they were chiefly three-fold. He did not attach much importance to the suggestion with regard to the saving in respect of local rates, because the bribe would be a very small one; and secondly, because he thought it would be too dearly purchased. He did not think that a saving of £100,000 in local expenditure was worthy attention if it entailed an increased Imperial expenditure of double that amount. But the right hon. Gentleman, in his efforts to secure uniformity of discipline, would have the hearty support of every magistrate in the United Kingdom. All of them must feel the importance of any measure securing that result. Not less important was the abolition of unnecessary gaols, and the consequent reduction of expenditure and labour. Lastly, it was important to settle the vexed question of the character of prison labour, and to remedy the undoubted injustice which existed in consequence of the concentration of this labour upon one or two trades which it entirely disturbed. He understood, with regard to this last point, that the right hon. Gentleman had pledged himself to find a remedy, and he (Mr. Chamberlain) had no doubt that justice would be meted out to those who had a claim to it. But he could not support the second reading of the Bill in reference to this matter, because he could not find any provisions in the Bill which would give the remedy sought. And as regarded the other objects, they were purchased at too high a price, at the expense of a distinct slur on local government and management. In the first place, it appeared that the patronage of all these local institutions was to be vested, as regarded the chief officials, in the hands of the Secretary of State, and as regarded the subordinate officials, in the hands of the Prison Commission, on the nomination of the visiting committee. This plan combined all possible objections, for on the one hand, if there was any reason to anticipate local jobbery or favouritism, there would be room for its exercise. On the other hand, if there was merely a nomination by the local authority, and not election, there would not be local supervision. As regarded the financial arrangements, those were to be taken from the town councils in boroughs where there were gaols, or from the visiting committee of justices in the county, and placed also in the hands of the Prison Commission. He had considerable experience of Government contracts, and while, on the one hand, he had never seen the slightest reason for believing in the existence of any fraud on the part of Government officials, while he found that manufacturers and others had been treated with courtesy and consideration by the Government, yet he was convinced that no system could be devised which was less competent to secure the best article at the lowest price. It would not compare for a moment with the advantages enjoyed by local authorities doing similar work and possessing multifarious sources of knowledge. These were his chief objections. The hon. Member for Burnley (Mr. Rylands) had spoken of the enormous increase in the expenditure likely to result from the transfer. To that he (Mr. Chamberlain) attached only a secondary importance. What he looked at chiefly was the dignity of their local life. It was quite true that the Bill proposed to preserve some of the authority of the visiting justices. The hon. Baronet the Under Secretary of State (Sir Henry Selwin-Ibbetson) had thought it necessary to speak in defence of the visiting justices, and anticipated their willingness to accept the functions entrusted to them; but he (Mr. Chamberlain) thought that if the Bill became law the visiting justices would have great occasion to defend themselves for their very existence. They might become ornamental, but would not be considered useful. Duties were still to be imposed on those gentlemen, which, although necessary, were not of a high character, and from time to time they were to visit the prisons, but all knew how purely formal those visits to the gaols would become. They were to report upon any abuses they might find in the prisons; but he need scarcely say that when all the prisons were under the authority and management of the Secretary of State and the Prison Commissioners, no abuses would exist. They might report if necessary upon any urgent need of repairs in prisons; if a drain required alteration, or a slate were loosened by a hurricane—they might report upon such things, but they had not the power to have the repairs done. They might take cognizance of a pressing necessity, but would have no further power. The functions left to the visiting justices would be limited, and almost of a contemptible character. But there was another authority set up in the form of Prison Commissioners, who were to have co-ordinate jurisdiction; two authorities would be working at the same time and for the same object. Although there were these serious objections to the Bill, yet he was bound to admit there were advantages pointed out by the Home Secretary, and he could not have brought himself to vote against the second reading, if he had not perceived an alternative, whereby all the advantages could be secured, and at the same time the authority of the local administration remain intact. Under the Act the Prison Commissioners were, in the exercise of their function, to conform to any direction from time to time made by the Secretary of State. He did not doubt reforms in the management of prisons under the control of Commissioners would result from instructions given by the Home Secretary. But why should not the Home Secretary give those instructions and those regulations for the advantage of the magistrates and visiting justices? It had been said that as the cost of maintaining prisons was to be removed from them so they should have no voice or authority in the management; but, as a matter of fact, though that might be a bribe to some small districts, it was not sufficient to satisfy the majority of local authorities. The Birmingham gaol represented a capital expenditure of £100,000, and that Birmingham was asked to transfer to Her Majesty's Government. That was no insignificant contribution as compared with the annual expenditure upon the prison. The hon. Baronet the Under Secretary of State had combated the term "confiscation," which had been used as describing this enforced contribution from the local authorities, but he confessed that that must be the light in which the measure would generally present itself. If it was not confiscation, at least it was disendowment, to which on that occasion he took very serious objections. If the gaols were to be taken for the sake of convenience and uniformity, why were reformatories and industrial schools excluded by a clause from the operation of the Bill? They were left under the control of their voluntary subscribers. For the reasons which he had given, he would vote against the Bill; and it was with pleasure he found the hon. Member for North Warwickshire (Mr. Newdegate) joining with him against the radical and revolutionary proceedings of Her Majesty's Government.

SIR WALTER BARTELOT said, that it was of course more agreeable to support any measure proposed by those whom one generally was proud to serve under and to follow. But it was the duty of men calling themselves independent when they conscientiously differed from their Leaders that they should express fully their views, without which no man was worthy of a seat in that House. He accordingly did so, and at the same time wished to express the pleasure with which he had listened to the views of the last speaker, expressed as they were with a convincing calmness, which was so acceptable in that House. One of his main objections to the Bill was, that it interfered with the local self-government of which they were all so proud, and he had hoped that his right hon. Friend the Home Secretary would have been satisfied with his victory last Session, and would have made more concessions to his opponents now. Although the Bill had certainly been improved in some respects, yet it was not improved in the way they had hoped it would be. In introducing the Bill this Session his right hon. Friend shadowed forth great improvements which did not appear to have been made, and certainly not to the extent expected; he had provided, no doubt, for short imprisonments for minor offences as he stated last year he intended to do. It was manifest that in such cases in which money payments could be substituted for imprisonment, people ought to be confined as far as possible in their own localities, so that they could communicate with the friends who might release them from imprisonment. This, no doubt, was a great improvement. In cases of imprisonment for three months, the last two were to be employed in remunerative labour or the learning of trade. This was good as far as it went; but it involved the danger that in the effort to make gaols pay the labour would not be so deterrent as it ought to be. Another point conceded was this—that small towns and places requiring accommodation for their prisoners would have to pay, and the larger towns and places in which the gaols were situated which afforded that extra accommodation would receive the payment. But his hon. Friend the Secretary of State went no further than that. The responsibility would still rest on the local authority to find and maintain the gaols. If the Home Secretary said a gaol was not sufficient, it might be sold, whatever it had cost, and the locality would have to pay for prison accommodation at the rate of £120 per cell, should the sum realized not be sufficient to pay that cost per cell for the accommodation required. He thought that very hard, indeed. They were going to take from the ratepayers of the country what they had subscribed for without giving them any compensation whatever. If that was not confiscation, he did not know what was. If the right hon. Gentleman formerly Secretary of State for War (Lord Cardwell) had come down to the House and said—"I intend to take all your Militia stores without paying for them," no man in that House would have condemned that so much as his right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Home Department. That was a parallel case. The question of centralization was a difficult one to argue, no doubt, and it was equally undeniable that there was some centralization in the Act of 1865; but, as the hon. Member for North Northumberland (Mr. Ridley) had stated, it was a centralization of degrees. The main objects of this measure might be carried out by the local authorities, the smaller prisons being scheduled and certain powers given to the Secretary of State; but although he would not say that the Bill was a slur on the visiting justices, it certainly appeared as if the Secretary of State had no confidence that they would carry out the stringent rules and regulations he laid down as well as the Commissioners who were absolutely in his power. The right hon. Gentleman, however, had himself admitted that the Act of 1865 had done great things, and if a similar Act were passed in 1877 there would be no reason to complain of the manner in which the magistrates would carry out their duties; for he (Sir Walter Barttelot) would lay it down as a direct fact that the visiting justices would delight to conform to rules of the Secretary of State, especially when they knew that they were carrying out a discipline which was to be universal. The results of this measure had been fairly shadowed out by the hon. Member for East Gloucestershire (Mr. J. R. Yorke). It would be followed by the centralization of the police. No doubt, many arguments might be adduced in favour of such a measure, especially in the metropolis, where Temple Bar formed the arbitrary limit of two separate and independent systems of police. Again, it would be argued how much better it would be if the county police had jurisdiction over the towns. But it would not stop there. Next would come stipendiary magistrates, though not, perhaps, under a Conservative Government; but they did not know what might happen in the future. He was sorry that it might be said hereafter that a Conservative Government was the first to cast a stone at the magistrates. It was a great pride in many men to become possessors of land so that they might become magistrates, and he was sorry that any blow should have been cast at a body who had been acknowledged to have done such services to the State by his right hon. Friend the present Home Secretary.

MR. GOSCHEN hoped, as several pointed allusions had been made to the course taken by the late Administration with regard to local government reform, he might be allowed to say a few words. The House ought to be congratulated on the fact that the debate had been conducted with conspicuous moderation on both sides, able and interesting speeches having been made, irrespective of Party considerations, by Conservatives who opposed the Government, and by hon. Members on his side of the House who supported the Home Secretary. His hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham (Mr. Chamberlain) had pointed out with great clearness and ability that, so far as the precise objects of the Bill were concerned, many on both sides wished to see them carried out; and so far as a classification of prisoners was concerned, and so far as administrative reform of the prisons was secured by the Bill, he (Mr. Goschen), for one, thought much was to be said in its favour; and he would further confess that the views expressed by many chairmen of quarter sessions and by many quarter sessions collectively had made a considerable impression on his mind. They considered it a move in the right direction. But it was said the Bill should be discussed by itself and should not be mixed up with local government reform; but the right hon. Gentleman must admit that it had been put forward as part of their scheme of local government reform, and it had been described by the hon. Member for East Gloucestershire (Mr. J. R. Yorke) as a redemption of the pledge given by the Government and an instalment of the debt they had contracted upon this subject. He should like to know from the

Chancellor of the Exchequer what he had to say in answer to that, and also how many other instalments were due. Last year that right hon. Gentleman was pressed to say how many more instalments were due, as considerable sums had already been paid, and something more was to be done this year; but at present it was not known whether this year would bear that strain upon its finances. He (Mr. Goschen) saw that the date mentioned for payments under the Bill was the 1st April, 1878; and seeing that there was an increase of £500,000 in the Civil Service Estimates—which might be still further increased—he thought the Chancellor of the Exchequer, as pointed out the other evening by the Leader of the Opposition, was in his heart grateful to those hon. Members who last year opposed the Bill, because if it had passed it would have imposed an increased charge upon the Revenue of this present year. The Government had thus escaped a difficulty by, what the right hon. Gentleman would pardon him for calling, his paulo post futurum system of taxation. Last year the House was told that there was little detail in the Bill, and that few estimates had been prepared in connection with it, because there had not been time in which to do it. A year, however, had passed, and they were still without detailed estimates. Though his right hon. Friend the Member for Pontefract (Mr. Childers) had asked the Home Secretary whether he would not prepare a Paper showing the cost of maintenance, building, and repairs, and how he had arrived at the estimated economies, the House was still without the means of checking the calculations of the right hon. Gentleman. Doubts had been expressed even by the hon. Member for North Northumberland (Mr. Ridley) on the point of economy, and if the right hon. Gentleman rested his case on the economies to be effected by the Bill he feared it would not be passed by the House. The hon. Member for East Gloucestershire stated very frankly that to him relief to local burdens was the great attraction of the Bill. But there was not that difference between the two sides of the House as to the desirability of giving relief to local taxation which hon. Members opposite supposed; the difference was as to the mode in which relief should be given. They on that (the Opposition) side did not desire that it should be given by continued Imperial grants from the Revenue to local committees. They were not anxious that measures should be brought in to give relief to local taxation which would not be passed upon their own merits; but they were anxious that local government reform should go on side by side with relief to local taxation. Their protest against the Bill last year was in part directed against the course which the Government had pursued from the first moment they came into office—namely, to pay their debts in a manner which was not consonant with the best system of local government. The hon. Member for North Northumberland in his able speech approved of the protests constantly made against centralization, and hoped it would be carried no further, and he did not take the view that the protests against it were an empty cry. Again, the hon. Member, making a distinct protest against the views of hon. Members below the Gangway, said he was not in favour of the transfer of the police; and he (Mr. Goschen) was delighted to see from the manner in which the remark was cheered by right hon. Gentlemen opposite that it was not one of the modes in which local taxation was to be relieved by Her Majesty's Government. But his hon. Friend went on to say—"Look at this measure by itself; it is a good measure, and therefore do not let us be carried away by the cry of 'centralization.'" He (Mr. Goschen) hoped the House would pardon him if he made this observation, that it was too much the tendency of this House of Commons to look at every measure only by itself—not to look back to precedents or forward to consequences, but to say—"This is a good thing in itself; let us do it because it is good, and not be led away by any general arguments. Let us not look back to precedents, because precedents are musty; nor forward to consequences, because consequences may be visionary." But he looked to the political character of this measure, and the House would pardon him if he protested against it, because, however good in itself, it was part and parcel of the legislation going in a dangerous direction. His right hon. Friend the Member for Sandwich (Mr. Knatchbull-Hugessen) had said—"What is centralization? It is simply the concentration of power in the Government; and if the Government have the means to do good why should we object?" He (Mr. Goschen) did not object to the Government having more power, but he did object to anything which, as had been said by his hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham (Mr. Chamberlain), in any way diminished the dignity of local life and institutions. He objected to a diminution of local activity, and to the doctrine that because the State was able to do a thing equally well it was wise for the State to undertake it. His doctrine was the contrary. It was this—"Let the localities perform as much work as they can; draw into the service of the State as many men belonging to as many classes as it can, fasten on them fresh responsibilities, and increase the dignity of their local life, and do not say because the State would do it equally well we must, therefore, transfer to it functions which have long been well performed by the localities." It was well known that this House was year by year becoming more overworked, the demands on the House were daily increasing, and with those demands, with all its industry, it was not able to keep pace. Panaceas had been proposed for that overwork which he entirely repudiated and rejected, and among them, it was proposed that the work of Parliament should be diminished by the separate countries which composed the United Kingdom apportioning that work among themselves, but that was not the way in which to relieve the work of Parliament. He wished to see the Imperial Parliament relieved, but he was not for any modified Home Rule. There was a talk of Home Rule; but he knew only of one "home"—the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland; he knew only of one "Rule"—the Imperial rule of the Lords and Commons of this Realm; and he would not by an indulgent or wearied turn of the windlass loosen the chain which bound all parts of the Empire together. It was by other means that he would seek to relieve the heavy work which Parliament had to perform. The way in which he would do so—if it was to be relieved—was by strengthening all local institutions, by increasing local work; by county organizations and municipalities and local bodies of the country generally undertaking duties which Parliament was not able to perform. His right hon. Friend the Member for Sandwich asked whether we had got institutions which could perform these functions. No, we had not, but he wanted to establish them. We did not want merely County Financial Boards, but local institutions through the length and breadth of the land which would be able to cope with the work which the country wished to have done. He was sorry to see work for local purposes, for financial purposes, for administrative purposes, and which would re-invigorate the counties, taken away from the local authorities and thrown on the Imperial Government. Allusion had been made to the schemes of the late Ministry for local Government. Certainly the late Government had an ideal before them and a plan which they were anxious to carry out in its integrity. They had no time to carry it out, but their ideal was this—that they should work up to a general reform of their own institutions. They knew what they wanted, and knew now what they meant. The present Government, however, were dealing piecemeal with the question; and, without desiring to subject Her Majesty's Government to adverse criticism, he contended that there was danger in going on passing measure by measure, even if the whole of them were in the same direction, unless they drew attention to what they were doing and looked the situation fairly in the face. It was not his desire to embarrass the Government upon this particular question, especially after what had occurred at quarter sessions, which, as he had said, had made a great impression upon his mind. He did not see in the Bill any economy, though there might be administrative improvement. But he did wish to know the mind of the Government upon this question. What was the "debt" which hon. Gentlemen opposite below the Gangway said was owing by the State to local ratepayers? How much did the State owe, and what would satisfy hon. Gentlemen? Were they going Session after Session to demand further instalments, or had we at last reached the extreme limit both of centralization and of sops given on account of local taxation out of Imperial funds? These were material questions. At the same time, looking at the general opinion of the country, he did not see that it was necessary to carry their opposition to this particular measure beyond a protest against the general policy of Her Majesty's Government upon this subject.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS wished to join in the congratulations of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the City of London (Mr. Goschen) as to the manner in which from beginning to end the debate had been conducted. Notwithstanding that it had been his misfortune to find several valued supporters of the Government differing with him upon the merits of the Bill, he could not help being struck with the moderation of the tone in which the measure had been discussed on both sides of the House. He had no desire to take the debate out of the line in which it had hitherto been conducted; but, without wishing to raise a disturbance on the points elucidated by the right hon. Gentleman opposite, he was anxious to say a few words in reply. The right hon. Gentleman had called attention, and objected in the first place, to the fact that the Bill was not to come into operation till April 1, 1878, so far as any great expense was concerned, though Commissioners must be appointed some time before. The reason for the delay was not on account of the financial operation of the Bill, but because, whenever such a measure was passed, it would be quite impossible for the Government to take over the prisons from the time of its passing. It would be necessary for Commissioners to go carefully into the circumstances of each prison in order to arrange for taking the whole over at some future date. In the next place, the right hon. Gentleman hinted that the Chancellor of the Exchequer had rather given way to paulo post futurum legislation or expenditure. He could not help reminding the right hon. Gentleman, however, that not very long since, in the very place in which he now stood, Lord Cardwell, as Secretary for War, proposed a charge for the abolition of Purchase which extended over a very considerable period. Again, Lord Cardwell contemplated the formation of an Army of Reserve which in the course of 12 years was to cost a considerable sum; and no one could forget the Education Act of 1870, under which the State had already contributed £1,500,000, besides £8,000,000 which had fallen, unfortunately, upon local taxation. These were questions involving millions; and when he came to speak of what was by comparison a paltry sum of £250,000, he did not think that the present Government could fairly be charged with any ulterior object in postponing the operation of the financial portion of the Bill till April, 1878. The right hon. Gentleman further said that what he wanted from the Government was some comprehensive scheme of county administration and reform, and that the late Government had a definite plan in their minds, and knew what they meant. Now, he (Mr. Cross) thought the House would agree with him that if they had a plan they never told the country what it was, and if they knew themselves what they meant they took care not to let the House into the secret. Then the right hon. Gentleman said the Government should have kept this plan in reserve, because then, when our comprehensive scheme of local reform was proposed, we should have a bribe to offer the local ratepayers. Now, he was rather sorry that the right hon. Gentleman had referred to what he (Mr. Cross) should disdain to call a bribe. Then there was the fear of centralization. He would not yield to any man in his intense admiration and love for local self-government. In his opinion, it was the great strength of this country. Nothing had made our country stronger or our Constitution more likely to last than the great freedom of local self-government, which had been given not only to bodies in the country, but to our municipalities. He assured the House that he would never take one step willingly to infringe upon the system of local self-government. He was for extending it as far as possible, in order that the several localities might be free to govern themselves according to their several wants and requirements. He was as strong an advocate as the right hon. Gentleman could be for drawing into local institutions with that view men of all ranks and classes. And he might remind the House that the Government had taken considerable steps in that direction already. They had thrown a great amount of burden upon the localities. What, he might ask, would be done by the Education Act of last year? What had they done by the sanitary legislation of last year? For his part, he was entirely in favour of throwing upon the localities the expense of everything that was necessary and suitable for their management; but there was one thing in which the reason for throwing expense upon the localities failed. They could not do so where the object in view was to obtain uniformity of management, discipline, and punishment throughout the country as in the case of gaols. If they threw those duties broadcast over the whole country the variety they got was fatal to uniformity. Therefore, in taking the management of the prisons out of the hands of the localities, he contended that he was not depriving them of any power which they ought to possess. The hon. Member for Burnley (Mr. Rylands) said, that one motive for the promoting of this Bill was that the officials of the Home Office wanted to get power and patronage into their hands. So far as he was concerned he could state that such a motive never crossed his mind. [Mr. RYLANDS: I never said it did.] The only object which he had from beginning to end in the Bill was to promote in the prisons of the country that uniformity of discipline, punishment, and management which he believed essential to the proper carrying out of the law. But the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the City of London (Mr. Goschen) asked where would those instalments end, and how many were to follow; and it was suggested by some hon. Members that the police might be next dealt with. Well, on that subject he might state that the police stood on a totally different footing from the prisons; and that, in his opinion, although in regard to the police there were certain anomalies which ought to be remedied, the circumstances of the case referring to that body were wholly different. So long as the law threw upon the municipality or the county the necessity of maintaining order, so long must the localities have the control of the police. Then, as to the question of instalments, he might refer the right hon. Gentleman to a celebrated debate six or seven years ago, from which he would find that they were brought very nearly to an end, and to the speech of his right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer in the debate on the Prisons Bill last year, from which the right hon. Gentleman would be able to draw his own conclusions. But the hon. Member for Burnley said, that the Bill would destroy the patronage of the visiting justices, and last year the hon. Gentleman the late Lord Mayor (Mr. Alderman Cotton) in-veighed very strongly against the dignity and privileges of the City of London being interfered with. [Mr. Alderman Cotton: Of the magistrates generally.] Of course, including those of the City of London. But really, as a matter of common sense, could they talk of "dignity and privileges" in reference to the custody of 18,000, or 20,000, or any number of prisoners? He would ask the hon. Member for Burnley and his hon. Friend the late Lord Mayor could they seriously speak of the dignity and privileges of magistrates being interfered with because the prisons were, as the Bill proposed, about to be taken from their jurisdiction? It was a very disagreeable duty which was imposed upon the magistrates by the statute, and they had discharged it not only to the best of their ability, but to the advantage of the country; but he could not understand how it was a dignity or a privilege. If it were an infringement of the dignity or privilege of the local magistracy to take prisons containing 18,000 prisoners out of their jurisdiction, was it not equally so for the State to take the control of 10,000 convict prisoners from them, as it had done for years, or even for the Judges to sentence a criminal to penal servitude in a convict prison, rather than to a short term of imprisonment? Where was the line to be drawn? Of this he was sure—that the House and the magistracy throughout the country would see that the argument which had been so urged could not stand for a moment. The hon. Baronet the Member for Maidstone (Sir Sydney Waterlow) said he did not think any material saving would be effected by the Bill. Well, he (Mr. Assheton Cross) had never brought it forward as a measure especially intended to promote economy. He believed, however, that it would effect great economy and a considerable relief to local burdens; but his main object had been an improvement in the discipline of gaols, and combined with that a relief to local burdens. On the average of five or six years the total expenditure on prisons amounted to £589,000, and, deducting the interest on the loans, the amount would be £547,700. Of that sum of £547,700 the Government believed that nearly £100,000 might be saved by economy in management. He had said last year that he could not pledge himself that such a saving would be effected, but he believed it was quite possible to be done. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Pontefract (Mr. Childers) asked last year why Returns on the subject had not been produced, and he could now state that all the necessary information could be obtained from the Papers upon the Table of the House. Estimating the expenditure, therefore, at £497,000 per annum, at the present time £101,000 came out of the public revenue, and £386,000 was provided for by the local rates. According to the calculations he had made, £381,000, instead of £101,000, being an addition of £279,000, would have to be provided for out of Imperial taxation, as against £386,000, which would be saved to the local rate-payers. The hon. Baronet the Member for Maidstone had alleged that it was unlikely that the Government would be able to maintain the prisons more cheaply than the local authorities, inasmuch as convict prisons were more expensive comparatively than borough and county prisons were. He might remind the hon. Baronet that there was nothing so deceptive as figures, though, of course, he hoped his own were correct. Convict prisons were exceptionally expensive. The men were under long sentences, had heavy work, and therefore required to be well fed, and the officers had greater responsibility thrown upon them and had to suffer greater expense, and therefore they had to be better paid. In addition to the cost of the conveyance of prisoners and providing them with new liberty clothing and gratuities on their discharge, the transfer of officers had to be borne by them. All those items made a considerable difference when the average cost of each prisoner was struck and was compared with that of prisoners in other gaols. The average cost for a considerable number of years of 18,000 prisoners in county and borough gaols amounted to £23 17s. 6d. against £30 15s. 6d. in convict prisons. When, however, the value of the labour came to be taken into account, it appeared that that of the prisoner in county and borough gaols amounted to £3 4s. 5d., while that of the prisoner in the convict prison amounted to £19. The hon. Member for Burnley had remarked that it was not fair to compare the value of the labour, because in borough and county gaols so many of the prisoners were only sentenced for a short term, during which the value of their labour was almost nil; but he did not think that that argument was supported by the facts. Objection had been taken to the Bill on the score of patronage, and it was said the Government was going to get a large amount of patronage into its own hands, and that the power of nomination to be conferred upon the visiting justices was illusory, because the Government might reject their nominees. He looked upon that, however, as one of the merits of the case, for the subordinate officials would all be members of one service, and it was most desirable that the subordinate should be appointed not to a particular gaol, but to the service, so that they might have an incentive to do their work efficiently and might be transferred from gaol to gaol as their merits deserved. A great number of men would have the opportunity of entering into the service, and the probability was that a considerable number of them would be very good men. Another objection that had been taken to the Bill referred to the position of the visiting justices; but he must remark that if the country was to spend the money on the gaols, it must have the control of them. He had, however, said from the first that the Government would not be able to carry on the prisons throughout the country without the assistance of the visiting justices. If hon. Gentlemen would look at the Schedule of the Gaol Act of 1865, they would find that a great number of things in a prison had to be done by the authority of some one on the spot, and for which it would be impossible to send up to London for instruction. If any hon. Member thought the visiting justices were nominally to be done away with because all their duties were prescribed for them, he would find himself very much mistaken. The magistrates would still have to see that all the rules laid down by the Secretary of State were carried out by the officers. The hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Chamberlain) said he would vote for the second reading of this Bill, if he had not got an alternative which he thought would be better. He wanted to preserve local jurisdiction, local control, local self-government. That was his sole object, otherwise he would vote for the Bill. What was his alternative? Why this—that if the Secretary of State would draw up all the rules that were to be observed by the visiting justices they would obey them. But if all the rules were to be drawn up by the Secretary of State, where was the local self-government? Local self-government and local control were preserved in the Bill, and therefore the alternative which the hon. Member for Birmingham had proposed had fallen down, and he (Mr. Cross) claimed his vote. He must for a moment refer to what fell from his hon. Friend the Member for North Warwickshire (Mr. Newdegate). His hon. Friend took a constitutional position. He said gaols now would be subject to arbitrary rules of the Secretary of State and would not be regulated by law. But his hon. Friend was in error, because if ever there was an Act in which minute directions were given for the enforcement of it, it was the Act of 1865. That Act would not be repealed by this Bill, but incorporated with it, and the Secretary of State would be just as much bound by the provisions of the Act of 1865 as the courts of quarter sessions were. He contended that no arbitrary rules could be drawn up by the Secretary of State, because he would be strictly tied down by the Act of 1865. Only one word more as to magistrates and gaols. His hon. Friend said the Bill would interfere with Common Law, and quoted Lord Coke; but Lord Coke had laid it down that gaols could only be erected by the authority of Parliament. [Mr. NEWDEGATE: May I ask the right hon. Gentleman to read the words of Lord Coke?] Lord Coke's words were—

Gaols, therefore, were always created by statute. But statutes could abolish them without interfering with the Common Law. Equally, so far as the justices were concerned, they had no power by Common Law over the gaols, and all these particular duties had been put upon the justices by Acts of Parliament. But the Common Law rights of the justices were not interfered with, only the statutory powers which they had had been granted to them for the performance of certain duties. He quite granted that in many cases justices had most admirably performed their duties, but—and here it was he found the only fault—justices, being totally separate and independent bodies, had no means of knowing what was going on in those parts of the country over which they had not jurisdiction, and therefore there were no means of insuring uniformity of discipline in gaols. That was really the whole of the Bill. Its objects were to effect an improvement in discipline and secure uniformity in management. He believed that that would lead to a saving of expense, and, as a subsidiary result, be a great relief of local burdens. If, as he hoped, he had shown all these improvements could be made without any great radical change, and he did not believe there would be any such change, he hoped the Bill would be read a second time that night, as in the last Session of Parliament, by an overwhelming majority.

PRISONS (IRELAND) BILL—[BILL 4.]

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, “That the Bill be now read a second time.”—(Sir Michael Hicks-Beach.)

MR. M'CARTHY DOWNING said, he was glad that the Irish Bill was on the same lines as the English measure, and that it would put an end in Ireland to a system that had long been in operation. The Grand Juries there appointed a Board of Superintendence, the composition of which was of a character he would not enter upon, but it was that Board who had the charge of the prisons. He should, however, like to know why the appointment of the visiting justices there should not be made as in England by quarter sessions, and why the powers to be given were not the same as those extended to the English visiting justices. Taking the case of the county of Cork, he ask how was it possible to carry on the administration of justice if there were only one prison? The distance to which prisoners would have to be sent was as much as 50 miles, which was very objectionable.

DR. WARD objected to industrial schools being placed under the same management as the criminal establishments. He hoped the Chief Secretary would see his way to removing that objectionable feature, but in other respects he considered the Bill an excellent one.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS - BEACH said, that one of the Inspectors of County Prisons in Ireland happened also to be Inspector of Industrial Schools, and bearing that in mind it had occurred to him that there was no reason why the same duties now performed by that gentleman should not be performed by others. It was, however, he admitted a question quite open to discussion. He had left the appointment of visiting justices in the hands of the Grand Jury, because there was no meeting of the magistrates in Ireland at all analogous to that of the quarter sessions in England. As to another point, whether power should not be given to visiting justices to nominate persons to subordinate positions, it was a question which might be fairly discussed in Committee, and if then any practical method of introducing such a provision into Ireland could be shown, all he could say was that he would look upon it favourably. The hon. Member for Cork (Mr. M'Carthy Downing) spoke of the inconvenience arising from sending prisoners remanded for a few days to the county gaols. He was quite aware of the inconvenience, and he did not intend to inflict it upon the country. The Bridewells would be retained as the lock-up was in England, and for the same purposes, and accommodation would be provided in the different districts for remand cases. He hoped the second reading would pass, and details be dealt with in Committee.

MR. BROOKS had hoped to hear an intimation that the rights of the Dublin Municipal Council in this matter would be respected.

CAPTAIN NOLAN expressed it to be his intention to vote for the second reading, although he looked upon the Bill as containing some objectionable provisions, and as tending rather too much in the direction of centralization. It had the merit, however, that it would relieve the people of Ireland of a very considerable amount of taxation.

MR. BIGGAR said, he thought the proper way to deal with the question would be to improve the Grand Jury system rather than interfere with the principle of local self-government. He did not think there would be any great saving when they came to put the measure into operation; and with regard to the mode of employing prisoners, he urged the necessity of caution in that matter, especially considering the outcry that was being raised against the interference of prison labour with the outdoor trades.

MR. PARNELL thought the Irish Members ought to pause before they expressed entire approval of the Bill. At the same time, opposition to it from them might be misunderstood in Ireland, where it was generally supposed that the measure would relieve the county ratepayers from considerable burdens. He would have preferred that the Bill should be delayed for a month or two, so as to give time to the Irish people to understand thoroughly its provisions. He confessed that he was in a difficulty with regard to the measure, but he certainly did not like its principles so far as it affected the question of local self-government. With regard to the reformatory schools that had been referred to, that was an important matter, and he hoped a clause would be introduced during the progress of the Bill by which those institutions might be freed from the opprobrium of being regarded in the same light as the prisons of the country. The industrial question was also one that required grave consideration; and he thought that in any general rearrangement of the prisons system of Ireland, the matter should not be overlooked by the Government. There was no doubt the agencies established for the sale of prison-made articles had been a serious injury to the artisans who were engaged in the manufacture of same goods. He thought the Irish people ought to consider very carefully whether the benefit they would derive from the Bill would be commensurate with the evil results it would bring about.

MR. O'SULLIVAN said, he could state from his own sad experience that he had suffered more in one month's imprisonment in the prison of his own county than he had in seven months in the Government prison of Mountjoy, Dublin. From time immemorial the principle he suffered under had prevailed, and for that reason he supported the Bill. During the months he spent at Mountjoy he was not insulted or persecuted. Prisoners there were treated in a very different way. His own experience, therefore, afforded a good reason for the amalgamation of prisons in Ireland. Another reason why he would support the Bill was, that he regarded it as a measure of economy which would give relief to the ratepayers.

MAJOR O'GORMAN moved the Adjournment of the Debate. He did not believe in the kind intentions of the Government after their conduct the previous night in putting up officers on the very front bench to talk against time.

MR. O'BYRNE seconded the Motion.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Debate be now adjourned."
(Major O'Gorman.)

SIR MICHAEL HICKS - BEACH could not admit there had been any talking against time on the occasion referred to, and he trusted the hon. and gallant Member would not persist in his Motion. The debate had proceeded very fairly; all the hon. Members who had spoken had been more or less favourable to the Bill; and if the hon. and gallant Member for Waterford had any arguments to advance against it he was sure the House would gladly listen to him.

Question put.

The House divided:—Ayes 5; Noes 199: Majority 194.

Main Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read a second time.

CAPTAIN NOLAN hoped the Committee would be put off for some time, as the people in Ireland knew nothing about the Bill, and hon. Members would shortly have to attend the Grand Juries at the Assizes in Ireland.

MR. PARNELL thought the business of the nation should be attended to before the local affairs of counties in Ireland, and thus the attendance at the Grand Juries was no reason for postponing the Committee.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS - BEACH stated that the Committee would not be taken till after the Committee on the English Bill.

TREASURY AND EXCHEQUER BILLS BILL.

GUN LICENCE ACT (1870) AMENDMENT BILL.

On Motion of Sir ALEXANDER GORDON, Bill to amend "The Gun Licence Act, 1870," ordered to be brought in by Sir ALEXANDER GORDON, Mr. M'LAGAN, and Mr. MARK STEWART.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 89.]

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Friday, 16th February, 1877.

OBSERVATIONS. QUESTION.

EARL GRANVILLE: My Lords, I am quite sure that the thinness of your Lordships' House and the state of the Notice Paper for to-night — there not being one single Notice put down — will afford some justification for the Question which I wish to put to the noble Earl the First Lord of the Treasury. I have no doubt he is aware that on many former occasions complaints have been made as to the paucity of legislative business in the House in the early part of the Session. Last Session certainly there was no foundation for such complaints, because several important Bills were introduced in your Lordships' House, and were dealt with by your Lordships in a manner which justified the former complaints. It is a fact, however, that on previous occasions there were such complaints as those to which I have referred, and what I wish to know is, Whether any of the Bills promised by Her Majesty's Government will be introduced in this House? I should also like to know whether the Government intend to introduce a Burials Bill, and if so, at what period it is likely to be introduced?

THE EARL OF BEACONSFIELD: My Lords, I quite agree with the noble Earl that it is desirable that the Business of Parliament should be more equally divided, if it be possible, between the two Houses; but those who have given attention to the subject have all come to the conclusion that it is one of the most difficult arrangements that can be devised. Now, with regard to the present Session, it so happens that most of those Bills which Her Majesty's Government have thought fit to introduce to the consideration of Parliament could not well be introduced in your Lordships' House, in the first instance. Some of those Bills are money Bills: others, upon matters of great importance and interest, have already been submitted to your Lordships' consideration; and it was therefore thought that it was only respectful to the other House of Parliament, when these Bills were introduced again, that they should be submitted to the other House in the first instance. That takes away two classes of measures. Then there are Bills connected with Scotland and also with Ireland, which your Lordships must feel as a general rule would be most conveniently introduced by the Lord Advocate and the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant. That again reduces the number of Bills from which we can select and introduce in your Lordships' House. The noble Earl (Earl Granville), however, adverted to one subject on which legislation has been promised, and which no doubt may be introduced in the first instance in this House—that is the Burials Bill. My noble Friend the Lord President will introduce a Burials Bill very shortly to your Lordships' consideration. It is not in my power to say the exact day at which it will be done; but I trust that next week I shall be able to inform your Lordships on the point. After the Burials Bill the Lord Chancellor will introduce the Bankruptcy Bill. Both of these measures will deserve your Lordships' consideration; and probably by that time also the labours—the suc-sessful labours—of the House of Commons will furnish your Lordships with further materials for deliberation.

TURKEY—THE PAPERS—CONSUL FREEMAN'S REPORT.—QUESTION.

THE MARQUESS OF BATH asked the noble Earl the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether he had any objection to lay upon the Table the Report of Mr. Consul Freeman, dated 17th March, 1876, and referred to in Sir Henry Elliot's despatch of the 23rd of November? He believed the Report had been promised to the other House of Parliament, and he presumed the noble Earl would not object to lay it on the Table of that House. Perhaps also the noble Earl would be further able to state when it would be in the hands of their Lordships?

THE EARL OF DERBY said, he had no objection to lay the Report on the Table, and he had no doubt it would be in their Lordships' hands in a few days.

EARL GRANVILLE observed that the Paper had been already presented to the House of Commons, and there was an understanding that when such Papers were presented to the other House they should also be laid on the Table of their Lordships' House.

THE EARL OF DERBY admitted that such was the understanding.

House adjourned at a quarter past
Five o'clock, to Monday next, Eleven o'clock.

NAVY—THE PURCHASE DEPARTMENT.
QUESTION.

MR. BAXTER asked the First Lord of the Admiralty, If it is intended to carry out the recommendation of the Select Committee on the Purchases of Public Departments, by placing the Purchases of the Works Department of the Admiralty under the control of the Purchase Department?

MR. HUNT, in reply, said, that the Admiralty were desirous of carrying out the recommendations of the Committee, and that the details were being inquired into, but that the amount involved was very insignificant.

QUESTION.

MR. MACDONALD asked the President of the Board of Trade, Whether he is aware that the schooner "Magie" or "Maggie," recently arrived at Bristol, has neither deck line nor load line painted upon her, and that, on her recent voyage from Newfoundland, her captain was washed overboard and drowned?

SIR CHARLES ADDERLEY: I am informed, Sir, of the schooner Maggie, of 147 tons, having recently arrived at Bristol from Newfoundland, with neither deck-line nor load-line marked on her sides. She had a cargo of fish and oil. I learn from the Casualty Return that during very rough weather on the voyage her captain was washed overboard. The acting captain states that he did not know the law. As she was never entered outwards from the United Kingdom she was not bound by the Act of 1876 to have any load-line. She comes within the deck-line section as a British ship, and we are calling the attention of the Colonial Governments to this point; but as she was a single deck ship this mark was of no consequence in this case. I have just written for, and shall have all particulars concerning this ship tomorrow.

THE CODIFICATION OF THE LAW.

MR. FORSYTH asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether, considering the many tentative attempts which have from time to time been made in that direction, and which have hitherto remained without practical result, it is the intention of the Government to take any steps, and if so, what steps, towards the formation of a code or digest of the Civil and Criminal Law of England, or either of them, or any part thereof?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL: Sir, I am desired to reply to the Question of the hon. and learned Gentleman. It is difficult to exaggerate the importance of the subject alluded to in this Question. In my mind nothing is more desirable than a codification, or, at all events, a consolidation of the law of England, and especially it is desirable to codify or consolidate that portion of the law which relates to crimes and offences and criminal procedure. The subject is, however, one of great difficulty. It is now undergoing very careful consideration by the Lord Chancellor and the Law Officers of the Crown, in conjunction with the Statute Law Revision Committee.

TURKEY AND RUSSIA—
PRINCE GORTCHAKOFF'S CIRCULAR.

QUESTION.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether he can, without detriment to the public service, inform the House if it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government to return an answer to Prince Gortchakoff's Circular to the Great Powers?

MR. BOURKE: In answer, Sir, to the Question of the hon. Baronet, I have to state that it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government to reply to the Circular of Prince Gortchakoff, but the date at which that reply will be sent will depend upon the course of events. In the first place, a change of Government has taken place in Constantinople. In the second place, negotiations at this moment are going on between Turkey on the one hand, and Servia and Montenegro on the other, for the restoration of peace. Thirdly, as a matter of European interest, it is desirable that before Her Majesty's Government have expressed their own views they should know something of the views entertained by the other Courts of Europe.

QUESTION.

EARL PERCY asked the Secretary to the Treasury, Whether it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government to introduce a Bill this Session with reference to the Crown Lands in the New Forest?

MR. W. H. SMITH, in reply, said, that it was the intention of the Government to introduce a Bill upon the subject shortly.

CLEOPATRA'S NEEDLE.—QUESTION.

MR. BOORD asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, If he will state the conditions on which the Egyptian Government are prepared to sanction the removal of the obelisk known as "Cleopatra's Needle" to this Country; and, whether they are such as Her Majesty's Government can agree to?

MR. BOURKE: Sir, the Foreign Office has, strictly speaking, no precise information as to the conditions referred to in the Question of my hon. Friend; but it has been informed by persons interested in the matter that the Khedive is willing to consent to the removal to this country of Cleopatra's Needle provided Her Majesty's Government will accept the custody of the obelisk when erected. The question of accepting the custody of the obelisk, supposing it to be brought over, is under the consideration of the Treasury.

SURGEONS OF THE VOLUNTEER FORCE.—QUESTION.

MR. HERBERT asked, Whether it is the intention of the Secretary of State for War to grant the request of the surgeons of the Volunteer Force, and give them the instructions necessary to enable them to teach a certain number of men of their respective regiments the difficult duty of carrying sick and wounded men in case of war; and, whether such instructions are carried on in the Army generally?

MR. GATHORNE HARDY, in reply, said, the subject referred to was under consideration at the War Office, and when reported on, it would come under his notice. At Aldershot a certain number of men of the Army Hospital Corps had been trained to this duty; but such instruction was not given throughout the Army generally.

TURKEY AND SERVIA—THE JEWS AND ARMENIANS.—QUESTION.

MR. SERJEANT SIMON asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether it is true, according to the statement which has appeared in a leading daily paper, that Servia has expressed her determination not to agree to the proposal made by Turkey, as one of the conditions of peace, for Servia to admit the Armenian Christians and the Jews to the same equal rights as the rest of her subjects; and, if so, whether Her Majesty's Government have made any representations to the Servian Government on the subject?

MR. BOURKE: Sir, Her Majesty's Government have no precise information on the subject; but they have been informed by telegram from the Chargé de Affaires at Constantinople that one of the bases proposed by Turkey to Servia was that the Jews and Armenians should receive equal religious and civil liberty with the Natives of Servia. Mr. White, Her Majesty's Agent at Belgrade, has been told to use his best endeavours to bring about an understanding between Turkey and Servia, and he reported on the 14th inst. that Servia had accepted certain of the Turkish proposals, and had replied on this particular point that the position of the Jews should depend on future Servian legislation. We have heard since that the Servian Assembly is about to meet; and therefore the condition of the Jews in the future of Servia will depend upon the legislation that will be carried out by that Assembly. Her Majesty's Government, I need not remind my hon. and learned Friend, have at all times done their best to procure justice for the Jews both of Servia and Roumania, and the House and my hon. and learned Friend may be quite assured that Her Majesty's Government will lose no opportunity of pressing their views on that subject upon the Servian Government.

MERCANTILE MARINE—TRAINING SHIPS.—QUESTION.

MR. PALMER asked the President of the Board of Trade, If it be the intention of the Government to bring in a Bill to encourage the establishment of training ships for the purpose of ensuring a better supply of qualified seamen?

SIR CHARLES ADDERLEY : A good deal, Sir, is being done by the Admiralty increasing the number of ships lent for the purpose of training boys, and in the encouragement given to the Boy Class of Naval Reserve. Eight out of 16 of these ships get aid from public money as industrial schools; some are pauper schools, and might get aid from poor rates, but do not. I attempted to introduce clauses in the Merchant Shipping Act for giving all ships training boys for the Merchant Service aid from the Mercantile Marine Fund, but I do not see my way to giving them any very effectual aid in that way at present. I shall be very glad to get encouragement from the shipowners to propose a small fee, under careful conditions, on engaging crews at the shipping offices, but the shipping interest is not sufficiently flourishing at this moment for me to suggest this without such encouragement. I do not think the system of compulsory apprenticeship which existed before the repeal of the Navigation Laws can ever be revived.

TENANTS OF CHURCH LANDS, IRELAND.—QUESTION.

MR. PARNELL asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland, Whether he is prepared to lay upon the Table of the House the documents referred to by him on Wednesday last, in which the Irish Church Commissioners suggest the inconvenience of the present mode of dealing with the tenants of Church lands as to the purchase of their holdings; and, whether, having regard to the admitted inconvenience of the present mode of dealing with these tenants, and the admitted advisability of some modification with regard to such transactions in future, the Government is prepared to introduce a Bill on the subject during this Session, and to recommend to the Commissioners the suspension of sales of Church lands in possession of tenants until some legislation takes place in reference thereto?

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH : The hon. Member, I think, must have misunderstood my remarks on Wednesday. The document referred to by no means suggested any inconvenience in the present mode of dealing with tenants of Church lands as to the purchase of their holdings, but objected to the Bill of the hon. Member. I do not think it was intended for publication, and therefore I carefully avoided quoting from it during the debate on Wednesday. It was written 11 months ago, and I do not think that, in present circumstances, any useful purpose would be served by laying it on the Table of the House. The Report of the Commissioners for 1876, which was only published yesterday, states that of 8,432 persons who were on their books as tenants when the Church property vested in them, 4,536 had up to the end of 1876 become absolute proprietors of their holdings under the provisions of the existing law, and that this number will be increased during the present year, as the issue of offers to tenants is still going on, and the sales of the property that was brought into the Landed Estates Court will be proceeded with. The Commissioners in their Report, referring to the above facts, allude, and I think with much reason, to the general success of the plan of creating a class of small proprietors out of a body of poor tenant-farmers. I was unable, from want of time, to obtain this information before the debate on Wednesday. But I think the House will be of opinion that it by no means bears out the assumption of the hon. Member as to the admitted inconvenience of the present mode of dealing with these tenants, or the expediency of some modification with regard to such transactions in future. I cannot undertake to introduce a Bill on the subject, nor do I feel that I have any right to make such a recommendation to the Commissioners as the hon. Member desires. But I will communicate with the Commissioners, as I promised to do; though, as the hon. Member chose to press his Bill to a Division, I might fairly consider myself absolved from that promise, if I did not desire that every facility should be given to these tenants to become owners, so far as is consistent with a fair price being paid for the land, and proper security for the payment of the purchase-money.

MR. PARNELL: In consequence of the unsatisfactory nature of the reply of the right hon. Baronet, I will on an early day move, that it is unjust and inconsistent with the spirit of the Irish Church Act and the declaration of the Commissioners, to proceed with the sale of the thousand farms which still remain undisposed of, until a measure to remedy the said inconvenience and thereby facilitate the purchase by occupying tenants is enacted.

THE ARCTIC EXPEDITION—EXTRA LEAVE.—QUESTION.

CAPTAIN PIM asked the First Lord of the Admiralty, If he would state to the House why the officers and men of the late Arctic Expedition were granted six weeks' full pay leave, after they had previously been granted three weeks' leave with double pay, the regulations of the service only allowing six weeks' leave after two years' foreign service, the Arctic Expedition not having been absent eighteen months from England; and, whether he has any objection to place upon the Table of the House the Admiralty Minute granting six weeks' full pay leave to the officers?

MR. HUNT: Sir, in consequence of the exceptional character of the services of the Arctic Expedition, and the fact that during the 18 months in which they were absent from England no leave could be given to the crews of the Arctic ships, three weeks' extra leave on full pay was granted to the officers and men, and I am sure that no Member of this House will grudge that little indulgence.

CAPTAIN PIM: The right hon. Gentleman did not answer the last part of my Question.

MR. HUNT: I have no objection to the production of the Admiralty Minute, but its production would give no further information to the hon. and gallant Member than I have already given.

AFRICA (WEST COAST)—THE GAMBIA. QUESTION.

MR. ALDERMAN M'ARTHUR asked the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether it is true, as stated in the "Daily News" of Thursday, February 15th, that Lord Carnarvon has ordered the Administrator of the Gambia to give notice to the British merchants at Bathurst that protection is now to be withdrawn from the trade in the River

Gambia above M'Carthy's Island; and, if so, whether he will lay the Correspondence on the subject upon the Table of the House?

MR. J. LOWTHER: Sir, the notice to which the hon. Gentleman refers cannot properly be termed a withdrawal of protection to trade in the River Gambia, as no such protection was ever guaranteed above M'Carthy's Island. The circular issued by the Administrator merely renews the caution repeatedly given to traders that in going beyond that limit they do so at their own risk. The so-called Treaty of 1829, by which land was proposed to be ceded above M'Carthy's Island, was negotiated without the sanction of the then Secretary of State, was summarily disapproved, and consequently has never had any validity.

THE MAGISTRACY, IRELAND — AP- POINTMENT OF MR. W. J. DEVLIN.

QUESTION.

MR. FAY asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland, Whether his attention had been called to a Correspondence which lately appeared in the public press of Ireland, to the effect that a person named William James Devlin, now an absconded bankrupt, has been recently appointed a justice of the peace for the county of Tyrone, his recommendation, according to the correspondence, having been based upon the fact "of his being a prominent Orangeman, and one likely to be a useful magistrate in a party riot;" whether the present Administration acted upon such a recommendation; and, if not, who is responsible for the fact of a person obtaining a judicial position on the merits of his religious partizanship; whether the supersedeas issued (according to the Chief Secretary's statement of the 15th inst.) was issued on account of Devlin's bankruptcy, or in consequence of the correspondence which disclosed the fact that those who recommended him for the magistracy based his claim to the commission on his being a leading Orangeman; and whether he has any objection to furnish to this House a Return of justices of the peace appointed for Ulster County since 1st March, 1874, specifying their names and religious persuasions, and also specifying such of them as are Orangemen?

Mr. Parnell

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH : Sir, I have seen no correspondence in which it is stated that Mr. Devlin was recommended for appointment as a justice of the peace for county Tyrone on the ground of "his being a prominent Orangeman, and one likely to be a useful magistrate in a party riot." If such a statement has been made, it is not true with regard to any part taken by the Government in the matter; and I am informed by the Lord Lieutenant of the county, with whom the appointments of county magistrates originate, that no such recommendation was made to him. But I have seen a correspondence from which it appears that Mr. Devlin, who was chairman of the town commissioners of Cookstown, and as such an ex-officio magistrate for that town, and who was also vice-chairman of the Board of Guardians of the Union, was recommended to the Lord Lieutenant of county Tyrone for appointment as a justice of the peace by memorials signed by the town commissioners of Cookstown, by the hon. Member for Dungannon (Mr. Dickson), who sits opposite, by a member of the National Board of Education in Ireland, by six magistrates, many clergymen, solicitors, and other professional men; and last, not least, by four Roman Catholic priests, and at least 50 other persons who are stated to be Roman Catholics. In these circumstances I would leave it to the House to judge whether it is fair, on the part of the hon. Member, to suggest that a person who at the time of his appointment seems to have been considered by all classes and creeds to occupy not only a responsible, but a leading position in the neighbourhood, "obtained a judicial position on the merits of his religious partizanship." Mr. Devlin has been, as I stated yesterday, superseded by the Lord Chancellor, in consequence of circumstances connected with his bankruptcy. A Return of justices of the peace appointed for every county in Ireland since March 1, 1874, was presented to the House towards the end of last Session, on the Motion of the hon. and gallant Member for Galway (Captain Nolan). It contained only the names of the gentlemen appointed, and I think it would be extremely invidious to specify the religious persuasion of those gentlemen. Besides, the Government have neither the means of obtaining information on this point, far less the means of obtaining information whether they are Orangemen or not.

MR. FAY was proceeding to complain that the right hon. Gentleman had not fully answered his Question, when—

MR. SPEAKER observed that the hon. Member had received an answer to his Question. If the hon. Member desired to put a further Question he should give a Notice on the subject.

MR. FAY said, that not being allowed to make an explanation, he should move the Adjournment of the House. The right hon. Baronet had stated that there was no correspondence containing the words in question—

MR. SPEAKER: The hon Member is now entering into debate, which is quite out of Order.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH: The hon. Member misunderstood me. I did not say there was no correspondence. All I said was that I had not seen any.

MR. FAY said, he would ask a Question on the subject on another day.

SUPPLY.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

QUESTIONS. OBSERVATIONS.

MR. GLADSTONE, in rising to "call attention to the Despatch (No. 159, of Papers No. 1) addressed by Lord Derby to Sir Henry Elliot on the 5th of September 1876, and to make inquiries from Her Majesty's Government with regard to the 'Treaty Engagements' of the Country therein referred to," said: Mr. Speaker—Sir, it is my first duty, and it is a very agreeable duty, to return my cordial and grateful thanks to my hon. Friends, three in number, who have so courteously given up the precedence they had obtained on the Notice Paper in order to enable this House, at the earliest and most convenient hour, to enter on the discussion of this question. I am well aware that I should be wrong if I pleaded that merely as an act of personal courtesy. It was, in my opinion, also due to the consciousness of my hon. Friends that this question is one of supreme and paramount importance, at the present moment, to the people of this country, and that it must continue to be so until, in some way or other, it has arrived at a settlement. At the same time, I do not presume—and, indeed, it would not be consistent with the terms of the Notice I have given—to enter upon the whole of the wide and almost boundless field of the Eastern Question. It is scarcely possible—as one may say with confidence—even after labouring a good deal upon the 1,200 pages of information supplied to us by Her Majesty's Government, to confine within the limits of a speech, however large might be the indulgence of the House, all the points connected with this great and absorbing subject. But it has appeared to me that the point to which I shall call especial attention to-night is one of great importance; and I will go to it without attempting to detain the House by any collateral matters not strictly relevant to the issue. I should wish, however, perhaps, I may say, for the entertainment as well as the information of the House, to make one exception which will not occupy more than a minute, because in a paper conducted with great ability in the North of England I read this morning a statement, not from one of the public, but from what is termed "An Occasional Correspondent," which I am rather desirous to contradict. It was a statement to the effect that a most formidable plan had been in operation for the purpose of dethroning the Sultan of Turkey and placing upon his Throne His Royal Highness the Duke of Edinburgh. The promoters of this plan are four most formidable individuals. They were, in the first place, Prince Bismarck; in the second place, the Emperor of Russia; in the third place, the Earl of Beaconsfield; and in the fourth place, Mr. Gladstone. I may venture to assure the House, that whatever may be the dangers and the possibilities of the Eastern Question, that there is no truth whatever in that statement. Now, Sir, I go to the despatch to which I desire to call the attention of the House, and which is in the hands of hon. Members. It is a despatch dated September 5, 1876; and the points in that despatch to which I wish to invite attention are two, one of them being that on which I intend principally to dwell. The first is, that on that date,

and, indeed, as it would appear at a considerably earlier date—namely, the 22nd of August—Her Majesty's Government had arrived at a very important conclusion with respect to the state of feeling in this country. Lord Derby informed Sir Henry Elliot that—

"any sympathy which was previously felt here towards Turkey has been completely destroyed by the recent lamentable occurrences in Bulgaria. The accounts of outrages and excesses committed by the Turkish troops upon an unhappy and, for the most part unresisting population, has roused an universal feeling of indignation in all classes of English society, and to such a pitch has this risen that in the extreme case of Russia declaring war against Turkey Her Majesty's Government would find it practically impossible to interfere in defence of the Ottoman Empire."

Sir, that particular passage in the despatch appears to throw a good deal of light—more than I, for one, was previously possessed of—on the intentions of Her Majesty's Government previous to that epoch; because, when they conveyed to Turkey the fact that, in their judgment, certain recent disclosures had made it impossible for them to interfere in defence of the Ottoman Empire in the extreme case of war being declared by Russia against Turkey, it certainly does appear to imply that until these disclosures were made they had distinctly cherished that intention. I wish the House to take notice of that fact. If I am wrong it is, of course, for the Government, if they think fit, to correct me in the inference that I draw; but I must say that it is something rather beyond anything that I, for one, at any rate, who am supposed to be pretty decided in my opinions on this matter, have found it necessary to lay at their door, and it is a circumstance which, if true, is of very considerable importance. However, the main matter is re-opened by the next paragraph of the despatch, which runs as follows:—

"Such an event" (namely, a declaration of war by Russia against Turkey), "by which the sympathies of the nation would be brought into direct opposition to its Treaty engagements, would place England in a most unsatisfactory and even humiliating position, yet it is impossible to say that if the present conflict continues the contingency may not arise."

The despatch then goes on to urge the Turkish Government, on that account, by all means to avoid driving matters to an extreme issue, and leaves it to the discretion of Sir Henry Elliot to choose the language in which he shall make his communications on the subject to the Turkish Government. Now, we are told here that, in the event of war between Russia and Turkey, the sympathies of the nation would be brought into direct opposition to its Treaty engagements. In the first place, I am extremely sorry that it was thought to be necessary at all to lay down any abstract proposition whatever, such as is here involved, at that epoch, on the Treaty engagements of the country. There was no necessity for it, as I conceive. It is most unsafe, as a rule. Her Majesty's Government had already, by a despatch which was lately laid on the Table, limited themselves in regard to Turkey to what is called moral support. They had stated to Sir Henry Elliot, on the 25th of May of last year, that the Turkish Government must not expect from Her Majesty's Government more than a moral support. I may, perhaps, make an observation on the nature of this moral support, which is tolerably well, though, perhaps, not universally understood. It is moral support as opposed to material support, but not moral support as opposed to immoral support that is meant by the Government. Now, that declaration had been made, and Turkey had no expectations—according to these despatches—had no title to entertain expectations of material support from Her Majesty's Government. But one of the difficulties encountered in reading through these Papers is, that, while everything that is declared in them has every appearance, and every just appearance, of being straightforward and decisive, there yet seems to have been somewhere or other under-currents of communications which were constantly counteracting the best declarations and the best intentions on behalf of Her Majesty's Government. And we now know that down to so very recent a period as, I think, the 8th of January last, the two principal persons in the Turkish Government were confident in their declaration that they were to have the support, in the last extremity, at any rate, of Lord Beaconsfield and Lord Derby. This is a very serious matter, because in the despatch that I have quoted you have not only the declaration of the Foreign Minister, but it was open to Sir Henry Elliot to make the communication to the Turkish Government. It approached, therefore, very nearly to the nature of an engagement to the Turkish Government. I do not well see how Sir Henry Elliot could avoid making that communication, because the purpose of the declaration in the despatch was to bring him to exercise great pressure on the Turkish Government in order to prevent them from driving things to extremity. Now, how could he best bring that pressure to bear upon them? Of course, by developing the very argument that Lord Derby made—namely, that, if Turkey drove matters, or allowed them to be driven, to extremity, the consequence would be that we should be placed in a position where we could not fulfil our Treaty engagements. Sir, I object to all those declarations that England is going to be put in a position where she cannot fulfil her Treaty engagements. I differ from the Minister as to what those Treaty engagements were; but I certainly do not admit that we have been, or are, or are likely, or can be placed in any position in which we should decline to fulfil our Treaty engagements. Now, Sir, what is the nature of these Treaty engagements? Where were they to be found? There are two Treaties which bear on this subject, and which contain the engagements taken by this country on behalf of the Ottoman Empire. The one of these Treaties is the more stringent of the two in its terms, but then it is more limited in regard to the parties concerned in it, and as to the parties who have a locus standi for the purpose of putting it into execution. I mean what is called the Tripartite Treaty, a Treaty between England, France, and Austria, to which Turkey is not a party, and which binds those Powers as between themselves jointly and severally to treat an invasion of the independence and integrity of the Ottoman Empire as a casus belli. Now, I apprehend I am justified in saying that Lord Derby could not possibly have had that Treaty in view; Turkey not being a party to it, it was not a matter that could have been introduced into this despatch. As I do not expect that it will be a subject of debate, I need make no further reference to it on the present occasion. But what are we to say of the engagement given under the Treaty of Paris—namely, the Treaty of March, 1856? What is the nature of the guarantees it contains? In the first place, let us look at the terms of the Treaty and see how much they amount to. I cannot understand how it was possible to found upon the provisions of that Treaty any such doctrine as Lord Derby has here laid down. In the 7th Article of the Treaty, which is the only one bearing on the case, there are three declarations. The 8th Article refers to a case that has not arisen; but the 7th first declares that the Sublime Porte is to participate in the advantages of the public law and system of Europe, and then it contains these three engagements, first, for each Power to respect the independence and integrity of the Ottoman Empire. That evidently has nothing to do with the case. The second is to guarantee in common the strict observance of that engagement, which could not be the matter which Lord Derby had in view according to any just construction of it, because in this despatch to Sir Henry Elliot he was not speaking of what England's duty might become in the event of a common resolution of the European Powers, but of the engagement the obligations of which England would be under upon a declaration of war by Russia. In the third place, the Powers are bound to consider any act tending to the violation of the engagement as a question of general interest. That covenant clearly is very important, but it is totally different from making war in the event of such an act as a declaration of war by Russia upon Turkey. When I referred just now to the Tripartite Treaty I did so in the belief that my statement would not and could not be contested, but there are certain signs which seem to indicate that it is not admitted by Her Majesty's Government, and, therefore, I must say a few words on the subject. This question, I think, arises, What is the nature and force of these guarantees in general? Are they to be understood as an abstract, literal declaration, wholly irrespective of all the circumstances which may intervene before the possibility of being called upon to act upon them arises, or do they depend, in particular, on the conduct of the party to whom the guarantee is given? I may, without offence, and with some advantage, perhaps, refer to the view of the case which I have often heard from the mouth of Lord Palmerston in the Cabinet, which I have heard in this House, and which I believe is, and certainly was up to a recent time, perfectly well known in the Foreign Office as a tradition. Lord Palmerston, who could not but be regarded as a great authority on a subject of this kind, used to contend, without much or any qualification, that the nature of these guarantees was to give the right of interference, but not to impose an obligation of interference. I name that proposition on account of the weight attaching to it from the high position and great ability and experience of its author, without, at the same time, inquiring whether it is necessary to go so far as to embrace it in its whole breadth. What I contend is that it is impossible to separate from any of these guarantees not only the general alteration of circumstances that may occur, but also the conduct of the party on behalf of whom the guarantee is given. My contention applies more especially when the guarantee at the time it is given has reference to certain presumed conduct which the party concerned is to follow, and when that conduct has not subsequently been followed, but, on the contrary, all that has been presumed and engaged fails to be fulfilled. In such a case it appears to me the liberty of the guaranteeing party is completely re-established. I say this because I was astonished both at this declaration of Lord Derby, which appears to me a most rash declaration on general grounds, and totally unwarranted by the terms of the Treaty, and because I find that his declaration, wide as it is, has been even further widened by Sir Henry Elliot. In his despatch of the 30th of September Sir Henry Elliot says—

“The Protocol on the subject of internal reforms in Turkey would constitute an infringement of the provisions of the Treaty of Paris, for it would confer on the Powers the right of interference in the internal administration of Turkey from which by that Treaty they were debarred.”

Such is the doctrine of Sir Henry Elliot. I meet his allegation directly, and I say that from such interference, by the Treaty of Paris, the Powers were not debarred, and in proof of that view I would refer to contemporary exposition—to the debates of 1856 in this House and to the letter of the Treaty itself. There is nothing whatever in the letter of the Treaty which debars the Powers from interference. What the Powers are debarred from is claiming a title to interference on a special ground, and that special ground was the fact of "the communication made to them by the Porte of the Firman which had been issued." That interference is entirely debarred and repudiated, and most properly; because, if not, it is quite plain that the issue of that Firman constituted an engagement on the part of the Porte, and had there not been a caveat of that kind either the whole of the Powers or any Power whatever would have been able to renew the incessant and general interference which it was one of the main objects of the Treaty to bring to an end. But the Treaty never denied the general and indisputable proposition that, with regard to any State whatever, especially with regard to a State constituted like Turkey, the effect of its conduct upon the general principles of humanity or upon the peace of Europe might be such as not only to warrant, but to compel, interference. From those general rights of interference, which, no doubt, ought never to be put forward except on the most substantial cause, there was no debarring of the Powers, and how in the world an able gentleman like Sir Henry Elliot, being Ambassador to the Porte, should have made so rash an allegation, it is to me wholly impossible to conceive. But we have it from his pen and we have seen, too, that Lord Derby held the opinion that we were under a Treaty obligation to take up arms against Russia should she declare war against Turkey, and that on account of the popular feeling in this country we should not be able to fulfil that obligation, and should thus be placed in a humiliating position. I know not which of these propositions is most to be deplored. I earnestly hope they form no part of the present creed of Her Majesty's Government. At the exposition of the Treaty in Parliament in 1856 Lord Palmerston entered fully into the question, and I think the upshot of what he said was that the moral right of interference on the part of the Powers must remain unquestionable. His assertion was certainly not less broad than that. I have noticed with some surprise that there has been an argument of late which was born on the Lord Mayor's day at the Guildhall, and which has received a great deal of additional weight and authority from the mouths of various Members of the Government since, to the effect that something happened in 1870-1 which gave a new force and authority to the provisions of 1856, just as if they had a fresh origin at that period. This has been so positively stated by the Prime Minister—and it was repeated, though in a less positive form, by my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House a few evenings ago—that I must entreat the House to bear with me while I state the nature of the occurrences of 1870-1. They are perfectly simple, I think, in themselves, and they show that nothing whatever was done in 1870 or 1871 which could possibly give to the Treaty of 1856 any stringency or any scope greater than that which it had previously possessed before these occurrences. What happened was this—In the very hey-day of the Franco-German War the Russian Minister took his opportunity of making an announcement to Europe. I will not cite the despatch in question; I will simply state the three propositions which on the 31st of October and on subsequent dates were advanced by Russia. In the first place, the Minister distinctly repudiated the provisions of the Treaty which limited the naval armament of Russia in the Black Sea. In the second place, he endeavoured, not successfully, I think, to justify that repudiation upon the ground that other Articles of the Treaty had already been broken by the other Powers; and that as they had been broken by some of the Powers for their own convenience, or to suit their own views, it was not to be expected that Russia would consent to remain under the galling pressure of those Articles which were most inconvenient and, as he thought, most insulting to her. Thirdly, he announced on the part of Russia that that country still adhered to the general principles of the Treaty. Well, Sir, this was, on the part of Prince Gortchakoff, a very formidable announcement, and we had to consider with care the course we were bound to pursue. First arose the question, should we resist this proceeding of Russia by war? The effect of this would have been singular, for it would not have been possible to make war upon Russia upon account merely of objectionable words. The war would not, therefore, have meant an immediate result. It would have been a contingent war, dependent on the proceedings of Russia. We should have waited till we found her giving effect to those declarations, and augmenting her naval armaments on the Black Sea. Well, Sir, I believe that would have been a novelty in the history of the world. Certainly it would have been an engagement of the utmost inconvenience, to say the least. But now, let us look at the mode in which, and the means by which, such a war could have been carried out. It would have been a war in which—although I know it was suggested by the noble Earl who was then the Leader of the Opposition (the late Earl of Derby) that we had betrayed our duty in not doing something very terrible in regard to Russia—I am not aware that he ever said explicitly what it was—but it would have been a war in which we should have stood absolutely alone, without a single ally in Europe. For what were the declarations of the Powers upon this Russian announcement? Every one of them disapproved it. Prince Bismarck said he disapproved it highly, but he was so busy with his own war that he did not mean even to send an answer. France was engaged in the same war, and suffering very heavily from its calamities, and it was impossible, therefore, to extract from her any declaration of a positive nature. Austria said that if we were disposed to be energetic, she would be energetic with us, but the energy she thought it would be proper to exert was energy in the direction of a moral pressure, with the view of retrieving the mischief which had been done, and establishing firmly the sound principle applicable to the modification of Treaties, as opposed to the principle on which Russia appeared to have proceeded. Turkey herself was not an objecting party to this proceeding of Russia, for—I think it was in the month of November, the original declaration having been made at the end of October—Sir Henry Elliot informed us that he had had a conversation with Ali Pasha, and that in the opinion of the Porte it was useless to hope to perpetuate the existing limitations of the naval power of Russia in the Black Sea. It was quite impossible, as far as Turkey was concerned, to ignore the national considerations which must influence Russia as to her position in the Black Sea. Such was the position in which we found ourselves; and yet in that position, when we were a party to nothing but a joint engagement together with the other Powers, we were very much reproached with not having adopted some startling course, with not having threatened some tremendous exercise of the force of this country—a threat not to be carried out at once, but to be held over the head of Russia till she had given effect to her declaration. But what was our position? Why, every Power in Europe had turned its back upon us. Well, Sir, in those circumstances, we in our great pusillanimity—[Ironical Ministerial cheers and laughter]—it was, no doubt, great pusillanimity, was it not—perhaps you would have done quite otherwise, and a very pretty mess you would have made of it—we, I say, determined not to adopt the course of making war. Well, there was another plan which some say ought to have been pursued, or, rather, some say was pursued. Some say that as we determined not to make war, but to proceed diplomatically, what we did amounted to a fresh start in the negotiations, such as had been made in 1856; that we went through substantially the same process as in that year, and re-settled the whole affairs of the East of Europe. That is the allegation. Well, Sir, an allegation more absurd, in my opinion, never proceeded from the mouth of man—absurd, inasmuch as it ascribes to us positively the minds of idiots. [Laughter.] Who but an idiot could have proposed to re-try the whole of that great subject, and re-settle the affairs of the East of Europe, at a time when Germany and France were totally incapable of taking part in it, with Russia in opposition to it, when Turkey did not ask for it, and Italy did not wish to meddle? It appears to me absurd on the very face of it. Yet, judging by his cheer just now, my right hon. Friend appears to think we had reached such a pitch of fatuity that we were on the point of entering upon that task. Another course, and, I think, the only one for men of common sense to adopt, was to endeavour to stop the leak that Russia had made, to repair the mischief that Russia had undoubtedly done when she repudiated—improperly, I think, as to the authority she assumed, but not improperly as to the thing desired, because I do not think the thing was in itself unreasonable—when she repudiated an obligation under the Treaty, and justified, or attempted to justify, that repudiation by alleging that other Articles had been already broken, thereby giving a shock to the whole credit and authority of the Treaty. It was our duty to replace the Treaty as nearly as we could in the position it had occupied before the declaration of Russia. That is what we endeavoured to do. We did not reopen the great provisions of the Treaty. We regarded the Black Sea provision as one on which Russia had issued her repudiation, and as being in the same position as before Russia had taken that course; we made certain amendments in the Treaty as regarded some matters of detail and of pure convenience, particularly as to the mouth of the Danube, and otherwise merely affirmed generally the provisions of the Treaty. There was no choice but to re-affirm them, unless we were prepared to re-try them on their merits. Was it possible to re-try them on their merits? And if it was impossible to re-try and re-settle them on the merits, what else could we do to restore the credit of the Treaty but give a general re-affirmation? Why, something analogous occurs frequently when an amendment is made in a will, and the whole of the unamended provisions are repeated, in order to prevent any possible doubt, but without implying that they have undergone any revision or fresh examination. The Treaty of 1856 was replaced by the proceedings of 1871 in the position, as far as possible, in which it was placed before the Letter of Prince Gortchakoff in the month of October, and, indeed, it was placed on a better footing. But then it is said—"You ought to have re-tried it; you ought to have re-examined it; you ought to have known everything that was going on in Turkey; you have no business to complain of what has been going on lately if you did not complain then." I entirely disclaim that proposition. The question of the conduct of the different Governments since 1856 with regard to what was going on in the internal condition of Turkey is a subject very likely to excite interest in this House, and I think an hon. Gentleman gave a Notice yesterday with reference to it. If it is desirable—and I think it would be perfectly legitimate—to have an inquiry into the matter, let it be a thoroughly full and complete inquiry. I cannot now presume to speak with certainty, not being in office or having the command of the official records; but, trusting merely to my recollection, I hold myself entirely responsible for every material proceeding of the Foreign Office during the time when I was Prime Minister. The Prime Minister has a special responsibility. It is the duty of the Foreign Office to bring under his notice everything of importance that goes through the Department, and it is his duty to make himself master of every one of the Papers. I am not conscious of having failed in that duty. Not wishing, however, to trust entirely to my own memory, which never was infallible, and is growing more fallible year by year, I have consulted my noble Friend who was then Foreign Secretary (Earl Granville), and neither he nor I can recollect that during the period of the late Government we were flooded with complaints as to the internal government of Turkey. I have no objection to inquiry; but at present, all I can do is to show that about the time to which I have been referring there was nothing before us which would have given us the leverage and moral power necessary for the purpose of raising up the whole question of the internal condition of Turkey. For this purpose I shall make a brief extract from the debates of this House. On the 5th of August, 1872, the late hon. Gentleman the Member for Kilkenny (Sir John Gray) asked this Question of my noble Friend (Lord Enfield) then at the Foreign Office, filling the post which the hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Bourke) fills so well at present—

"Whether the authorities of the Ottoman Porte are giving effect to the provisions contained in various edicts issued by the Sultan of Turkey during recent years in favour of his Christian subjects?"

It will be seen that that was a very general question, and not limited to the occurrences of the moment, but referring rather to a general state of things. Well, the Answer of my noble Friend (Lord Enfield) was as follows:—

"Sir, the latest report from Constantinople, received two days ago, states that, as a general rule, the edicts in favour of the Christians are fairly carried into effect, and that, as a class, they have no reason for complaint."—[3 Hansard, ccxiii. 454.]

Whether that was a true statement of what was going on, or whether it was not too sanguine, I have no means of saying, but that it was the exact truth, as far as Lord Enfield knew, I am certain. Whether he was correctly advised, after what has recently happened, I am not so sure, but that shows what our information was at the time with regard to the interior of Turkey. Well, so much then for the supposition that this question of Treaty engagements is in some extraordinary and mysterious manner affected by the proceedings which occurred when Russia repudiated the limitation of her naval force in the Black Sea, and when we in consequence obtained from her her signature to a solemn Protocol in which the principle was distinctly and even elaborately set forth that it was not in the power of any single State to withdraw itself from the obligations of the Treaty. Those proceedings lay down in the most stringent terms this principle, to which Russia gives her signature, that it is an essential principle of the Law of Nations that no Power can liberate herself from a Treaty unless with the sanction of the contracting Powers, by means of amicable arrangements. Therefore, we did all that in us lay to replace the Treaty of 1856 in a position of credit, but we did nothing to give a new stamp to its engagements. Now, I have said that by this despatch of September 5 we were most unnecessarily and most unwisely committed to the assertion of a most dangerous proposition with regard to the obligations of that Treaty; but I am bound to say, and I say it with satisfaction, that I do not find that there is a rigid uniformity—I think my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House called it a slavish uniformity—in the declarations of Her Majesty's Government on the documents proceeding from the Foreign Office. On the contrary, these declarations have more the character of a flower garden. If we turn to the Prorogation of 1876 and the whole of their declarations last Session, we shall see that the great object of the Government then was to maintain the obligations and the Treaties to which I am referring. This was evidently in the mind of Lord Derby in writing the despatch of the 5th of September, and in the gracious Speech in which Parliament was dismissed from their severe labours at the close of last Session I find that Her Majesty is made to speak of "the duties imposed upon Me by Treaty obligations, and those which arise from considerations of humanity and policy." Far be it from me to say that Her Majesty has not borne that in mind, but undoubtedly in the Speech delivered from the Throne at the opening of Parliament there was no evidence given of its being borne in mind, for then the note was changed, and we were told what the Queen's object had been throughout. On the 8th of February, her object had been—

"To maintain the peace of Europe, and to bring about the better government of the disturbed provinces, without infringing upon the independence and integrity of the Ottoman Empire."

There is no obligation there to go to war in defence of the Turkish Empire. That is an important point, and is distinctly embodied in the despatch of the 5th of September; but to my great satisfaction, when I heard the Speech from the Throne, that had been erased from Her Majesty's political memory, and found no place in the Speech. Now, as late as the 9th of November, in the speech of the Prime Minister, the doctrine of Treaty obligations was full blown and exhibited in the most magnificent proportions. It was the key-note of the speech, but very shortly after he began to tumble down, to shrink, and to collapse, and unquestionably, if I understand it in the declarations of Lord Salisbury at Constantinople, it at any rate insinuated, a very different doctrine, for he says that "If Turkey refuses the advice of the Powers her position will have undergone a total change in the face of Europe?" Now, what is the total change she has undergone? I do not think it is a change in her moral character, for that could have been estimated before quite as well as now. I think her moral character was estimated by her refusal to join in the proposals of the Powers. It must, then, have been a political change to which Lord Salisbury referred, and if so I do not know what change Turkey has undergone in that sense unless Lord Salisbury meant that she is no longer entitled to expect, under the stipulations of the Treaty of Paris, any material help from anybody whatsoever. We then come to the 8th of February and the declarations of that date. I must not refer particularly to the speeches which were then made by Members of the Government; but so far as I am able to comprehend their character through the medium of the reports of them which have appeared, they are totally irreconcilable with the despatch of the 5th of September. Now to that despatch I do not wish any evil, except that it may disappear and may no longer dwell on the minds of men as portion of the practical materials with which we have to deal. And if the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for War, or my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House, should follow me in this debate, I would wish to hear from him not so much a justification of this particular despatch—that is a matter of indifference to me—as a sound doctrine, applicable to the present state of things. I do not doubt that many Members of the Government who may have held the particular doctrine of which I have been speaking in the month of September have since changed their opinions. They may say that the refusal of the advice of the Powers by Turkey was in the eyes of all an offence, and that that offence having been committed, they now hold themselves altogether free to act as they may think fit. But, at all events, the House will feel that this despatch is one of so formidable character, and the whole subject is one of such difficulty, that it was necessary it should be brought under the notice of the House. We shall have much to reflect upon and much to say and to consider in respect to the kind of policy which this country may have to pursue on this great Eastern Question, which is neither settled nor, so far as I can see, has made much visible progress towards a settlement, except in two points of secondary importance connected with the making of peace between Servia, Montenegro, and the Porte. It is most important then, in my opinion, that we should know before we proceed further how far our hands are tied by Treaty engagements in the judgment of those by whom we are represented in the face of Europe, and how far we are free, on the contrary, to do that which is just and right in itself. I therefore will ask Her Majesty's Government these three Questions, and will sum them up thus—First of all, whether the words “humiliating position,” mentioned in the despatch, mean the position of a State bound by a Treaty to go to war in a certain event, but disabled from doing so by the national sentiment; secondly, it having been the opinion of Her Majesty's Government on the 5th of September that we were then bound by Treaty to go to war for Turkey, if she were attacked by Russia, did they then consider her title to our aid was not affected by her breach of faith in regard to the reforms promised? And lastly—and I think it is the real material question—is that still their opinion, or do they now consider that we are absolved from the obligations asserted in the Treaty of 1856, and that we are free to act as policy, justice, and humanity may seem to direct and require.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY: The speech, Sir, in which the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Gladstone) has just addressed us has, I must say, been one of great calmness, and has not been calculated to excite any of those passions and emotions which some of his speeches on former occasions may have tended to produce. He has put certain Questions to the Government, and I wish he had formulated them on the Notice Paper, as we had reason to expect he would, so that I might be able to quote them more fully in replying to them; but I hope, at the same time, I shall have no difficulty in referring to them pretty accurately. Now, let me say at the beginning, and it may be taken as an answer altogether, that we do not consider ourselves to be set free from the obligations of the Treaties to which we were parties in 1856, and in the Treaty which was made in 1871.

MR. GLADSTONE: When I spoke of freedom from obligation, I meant entirely in respect to Turkey.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY: I was merely giving a general answer to the right hon. Gentleman in the first instance, that he might understand our position. I will come to what I have to say on that subject a little later, but I am obliged to look rather at what recently fell from the right hon. Gentleman in this House with respect to his view of these Treaties. I understood the right hon. Gentleman to say upon the first night of the Session that he was prepared to argue that Turkey was entirely outside the Treaties to which she was a party with us, but that we remained still bound to the other parties.

MR. GLADSTONE: I said that Turkey had lost her rights under the Treaties, not that she was not bound by Treaty obligations.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY: Well, we have at least got the statement that Turkey is to be thrust into the cold, outside the Treaties, without any rights or claim on any one connected with them, but that she is still to be saddled with all the obligations which they impose. [Mr. GLADSTONE: No, no!] I hope I am not misrepresenting the right hon. Gentleman. I am most anxious not to do so, because it is only a waste of time to reply to arguments which have not been used. I understood the right hon. Gentleman to say, first of all, that Turkey had no right to call upon us for the fulfilment of the obligations into which we have entered with her, and that, upon the other hand, we have a right to call upon her to fulfil the obligations into which she entered with us. [Mr. GLADSTONE: I made no mention of that at all.] Now, when I am asked whether we are bound by a Treaty, I should like to know what view ought to be taken of the position of our co-partner in that Treaty, and how far is she bound. I want to know this—Is Turkey bound to Europe by the Treaties of 1856 and 1871 or not? If she is, then I say boldly, peremptorily, and strongly, that Europe is bound by those Treaties to her. You cannot escape from that position. It cannot be possible that there should be a bargain made between two parties, and that the consideration which is given by one party and which is the ground by which the other is bound should be taken away so as to set that party free alike from the obligations as well as from the benefits of the bargain. Was such a thing ever heard of as that after having entered into a treaty with a man, you should say to him—"Now, you have behaved so very ill, that I will have nothing more to do with you. I promised you a good deal on my part, and you promised something on your part. I hold you to your bargain to fulfil that which you have agreed to, but do not look to me to fulfil any part of my obligations." Now, I want to know whether that is the position which I have to contest. The right hon. Gentleman says he will not say what the obligations of Turkey are. But I am obliged to say, because unless all my co-partners in the Treaty are bound I am not bound. Why was the Treaty renewed in 1871? Because certain Articles were taken out of the Treaty of 1856, and negotiations were entered into for the purpose of renewing that Treaty. Why? Because otherwise we should have been released from our obligations under that Treaty by the very different form it had assumed. Unless we had become partners to it in a new form, Turkey and Russia might have agreed between themselves about the Black Sea, but we had a right to be consulted, and if they had entered into a Treaty regarding the Black Sea we should surely have been released from the former one. It was therefore necessary that the Treaty of 1856 should be re-settled and confirmed, which was done; and when the right hon. Gentleman says, as he does, that we are taking some extraordinary view as to this Treaty of 1871, as if there was some new force and new origin given to our obligations to Turkey—that is a contention which I never heard, and is entirely owing to great misapprehension. It has never been argued that there is any new stringency or force in that Treaty beyond that of 1856. What was alleged was this—You say—"Turkey has forfeited her rights." When did she forfeit them? I find that in 1860 Russia was complaining of exactly the same conduct with respect to the Christian subjects of Turkey as she has been complaining of since. I find that there have been since the cases of the Lebanon and Crete, instances which called special attention to the conduct of Turkey towards her Christian subjects. And when the right hon. Gentleman, who has been forming a long catalogue of Turkish abuses, tells us that the crime of Turkey extends even to her origin—that she is so anti-human in herself, that she has never been able to be human on any occasion—it is a lame and valueless answer to us, when we ask whether, in 1871, she had not arrived at such a climax of iniquity as to be put out of the pale of civilized society, to refer to a Question put in this House to Lord Enfield, and which was answered to the effect, that up to that time the edicts seemed to have been fairly fulfilled. Such was the state of information at the Foreign Office in 1872. What has been said with respect to the information of Sir Henry Elliot? When Sir Henry Elliot had been remonstrating again and again, and calling the attention of the Porte to these things, yet because he did not know of a certain transaction in a certain place, he was held up to the scorn and execration of the world for having neglected his duty. The right hon. Gentleman has told us that Turkey was covered with a network of Consuls and Vice Consuls—officers who could not have avoided seeing these several things which occurred. Why, Sir, even at the time the right hon. Gentleman speaks of, there were even more Consular and Vice Consular officers than there were last year, because the number had been diminished; and one of the grievances that has been complained of has been that we were not sufficiently fortified in our number of officers, so as to be able to watch what was going on in those countries. Therefore these things have happened, and not sufficiently early information of them has been given. I find that so far from it being the case that you have these Consular officers everywhere, Sir Henry Elliot complains that there were not enough of them, and if you look at his despatch you will find there were only three who could give him any information on this subject at all, and that they could not guarantee its correctness. This is the reason why we alluded to the Treaty of 1871. We say that when you came to re-consider the position of Russia as regards Turkey and the position of Russia and Turkey as regards yourselves, it was your bounden duty to inquire into the position of things which existed at that time. And I will ask the right hon. Gentleman one question. Were not the negotiations appertaining to that Treaty protracted negotiations? Were there not constant interviews between the parties? The right hon. Gentleman tells us that Germany and France were so engaged in war with each other that they could not attend to it. But each of those Powers was represented as signatories in the Conference which took part in re-settling that Treaty. It is idle, therefore, to say that, because they were engaged in war, they could not give attention to the matter through their Ambassadors or Envoys who were here. These Representatives entered into the negotiations, and they had an opportunity of going fully into the delinquencies of Turkey, and deciding if she were to be thrust out into the cold. The question before us now is not whether we should have gone to war at the time of the re-settling diplomacy, as it is called, in 1871. The question is, whether when they undertook to re-settle this Treaty of 1856 in 1871 it is a fair argument for anybody to say—You entered into a Treaty with people who you considered had sufficiently clean hands to unite them with yours, and if it be true that Turkey since 1856 had been utterly neglecting the duties which you say she had stipulated to perform, it follows as an irresistible conclusion that you who made the Treaty of 1871 have no right to turn upon us now and say we are to be blamed because we maintain that it is our duty to fulfil the obligations which you then undertook. The Treaty of 1871 goes into great detail as to those parts of it which affect the questions which were before them. By Article 8 it says that—

“The high contracting Parties renew and confirm all the stipulations of the Treaty of March 30, 1856, as well as its annexes as modified by the present Treaty.”

Then the right hon. Gentleman has read to us the Protocol, which laid down as a principle that one party to the Treaty should not be able to annul that Treaty, and take advantage for himself by getting rid of some stipulations to which he is a party. Well, be it so; but then has any one party to a Treaty, do you think, the right to say without consultation with the others, that another party to the Treaty is thrust outside of it by some conduct of its own, they electing of themselves to say how far that one party is disqualified by its conduct to be one of the co-partners in the Treaty? Have they a right to say they will thrust that party out and acknowledge no duties and obligations towards it for the future without coming to that amicable settlement with the other Powers, which they would have to do in order to get rid of any stipulation in respect of themselves? But, Sir, did Turkey enter into a stipulation? I am unable to find it. As to the particular point upon which the right hon. Gentleman has relied, it is not a stipulation. Turkey undertook to her own subjects that she would issue certain Firmans, and give them certain liberties. Well, she did issue those Firmans, and, according to Lord Enfield, up to 1871 it appears that the edicts had been fairly fulfilled. [Mr. GLADSTONE: No, no!] I am only taking the information of the Foreign Office in 1871; and I must say the right hon. Gentleman did not seem very much to rely upon that. There the information was, however.

MR. GLADSTONE: It was in 1872.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY: In 1872 Lord Enfield said that as far as he knew the edicts had been fairly fulfilled.

MR. GLADSTONE: He said that they were then being fairly fulfilled, not up to then.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY: Up to 1872, then, it comes to this—that there appears to have been no knowledge as to how the edicts were fulfilled at all; but upon inquiry in 1872, Lord Enfield was enabled to say that at that time they were being fairly fulfilled. They had got so far. Holding, then, as I do, that the release of a person from the benefits of a Treaty is a release also from the obligations of a Treaty, I want to know whether bad conduct on the part of a member of a Treaty to its own subjects is a sufficient ground for excluding it from the European advantages, and for excluding Europe from the advantages she derives from that Treaty? I remember hearing once what was thought a very extraordinary thing with regard to bank notes, and this seems to be quite as extraordinary. You have made a Treaty with Turkey, not for the benefit of Turkey. That is an entire mistake. Last night I happened to be looking at the last volume of the Despatches of the Duke of Wellington—a work to which I would ask hon. Gentlemen to refer on the Eastern Question. You will find that Lord Ellenborough, as long ago as 1829, used almost the very words which I have used just now. He said—

“This was not for the benefit of Turkey, but for the benefit of Europe. The Ottoman Empire stands not for the benefit of the Turks, but of Christian Europe—not to preserve Mahomedans in power, but to save Christians from a war of which neither the object could be defined, nor the extent nor duration calculated.”

I could not express myself upon the question in any shorter or better language than that. Well, according to the right hon. Gentleman, you have not entered into these engagements with Turkey for the benefit of Europe; and you are suddenly to say that Turkey has no right to call upon you to carry out any part of that Treaty. Then, I say, it follows as a matter of course that Turkey has a right to say she is released from all the obligations of that Treaty. Then it comes to this—that, because somebody has ill-treated somebody else, that you are to deprive yourself of the advantages which he is bound to give to you. It is exactly the story of the Irishmen who when they quarrelled with the bank, burnt its notes, because they thought thereby to inflict punishment upon the bank, whereas they were really inflicting it on themselves. In other words, you have treated me very ill; you have given me a bank note, a promise to pay, and inasmuch as you have behaved very ill, I decline to accept your promise to pay, and burn your note. That does not seem to be a satisfactory mode of dealing with a great question. The right hon. Gentleman asks me whether under this Treaty we are bound to go to war. Sir, under this Treaty we are not bound to go to war, nor is there anything in the Treaty which can compel us to go to war. The Treaty of 1856 is a Treaty which says that under certain circumstances things shall become matter of general interest. That is the whole of it. But conjointly with the Great Powers of Europe we guarantee the independence and integrity of Turkey. Now, with respect to that I want to know up to what period we have acted with the Great Powers in respect to that guarantee. We say it was at the very beginning and foundation of the Conference. The basis on which the Conference acted began with the very words—that it was to be assumed they were acting in the interest of the independence and integrity of Turkey, and that is as binding on us as on the other Powers. My hon. and learned Friend opposite (Sir William Harcourt) has raised a somewhat curious question on that Treaty, but it is one to which I can only allude in passing, this not being the time to discuss it. I understood my hon. and learned Friend to contend that the Conference sat under the Treaty, and that by virtue of the 8th Article of the Treaty the resolution of the Conference had a specially binding force. Now, I agree entirely with the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich that this Conference—and, indeed, the interference in the affairs of Turkey—had nothing whatever to do with the Treaty itself, nor with the powers given us under the Treaty. In 1856 Lord

Mr. Gathorne Hardy

Aberdeen raised that very question, and said—"Are you going to take from yourselves the power of interfering when you see wrong done in Turkey?" and Lord Cowley answered, "Very far from it." All that was provided by the Treaty was this: The Porte having made a communication to the Powers, they said—"We do not claim under this Treaty any right of interference in consequence of that communication; but we retain all our old rights of calling your attention to certain things"—and this of course would be more pressing in the case of Turkey than in the case of other Powers. But the right hon. Gentleman will remember that with respect to Italy and Spain there were the most extraordinary steps taken. When we talk of the strong despatch of my noble Friend (the Earl of Derby), I do not suppose that anything could be much stronger than the despatch of Lord Palmerston to Spain, which led to the Spaniards sending away our Ambassador. I believe we have been acting in respect to the Conference quite irrespective of the Treaty; it is a different subject we have gone upon, and not that at all. Well, the Questions which the right hon. Gentleman has put appear to me to depend mainly upon one despatch, that of Lord Derby, No. 159; and in the first place I would remark that it is a despatch not addressed to any Minister of Turkey, nor in its terms for their particular use, in the form in which it is couched. It is addressed to Sir Henry Elliot, but it is not ordered to be read to any Turkish Minister. It says—

"Her Majesty's Government leave it to your Excellency's discretion to choose the arguments which you shall employ, but you will see from what I have stated how essential it is that the Turkish Ministers should be made alive to the position in which the conduct of their own authorities have placed them, and you will understand that you are warranted in using the strongest language, should the occasion require it, to enforce upon the Porte the expediency of a pacific policy, and of moderation in the terms to be proposed."

Now, Sir, I am prepared to say that circumstances might very well have happened which might have put this country into a very humiliating position. The right hon. Gentleman supposes that Lord Derby alluded only to the Treaty of 1856, to which Turkey was a party. I say, on the contrary, that my noble

Friend alluded to all the Treaty obligations to which this country, is a party. He alluded to the Tripartite Treaty between Austria, France, and ourselves, and I say that it would be a great humiliation to this country if being called upon by France and Austria to fulfil our obligation under that Treaty we were compelled to say that, although the obligation was binding upon us, as we were bound to admit, yet nevertheless, in consequence of the feeling of the country—or it might be of the country and the House of Commons—we were unable to have regard to it. That, I say, would be an extremely humiliating position, but whether such a thing is likely to occur is another matter. I do not think we are likely to be called upon by France or Austria to fulfil our obligation; nor do I think that Turkey has any right whatever, not being a party to the Treaty, to call upon us to do so. What, then, is our position? It was explained very clearly the other day by my noble Friend. I do not pretend to give his words, but in substance he said that under the Treaty of 1856 we were in no degree pledged to go to war; that as early as May last year we had given full notice to the Porte that the feeling of the country was very different from that which prevailed at the time of the Crimean War, and that they were not to expect from us material assistance. That this was urged in conference with, and I believe put forth in conversation with the Minister of the Porte here on more than one occasion, sufficiently appears from the despatches in the hands of the House. There, was, therefore, no concealment of our position. We have held that language throughout. We have endeavoured to use the moral influence of this country to attain two objects—the maintenance of the peace of Europe and the maintenance also of the independence and integrity of Turkey. The right hon. Gentleman has not gone on this occasion into the question as to what was meant by the independence and integrity of Turkey, and I gather from the words he has used as to other discussions that are to come on, that he did not desire to go into that question now. But I assume that having agreed with all the Great Powers that that was the basis on which we rested, we were to maintain the independence and integrity of Turkey in the sense the words imply. On that point I would be quite ready to meet the right hon. Gentleman, should the necessity arise. Then the right hon. Gentleman said—though he did not dwell upon it—that he considers the despatch of the 5th of September was not in conformity with what subsequently occurred. I was not able to follow the right hon. Gentleman on that point, for he did not say, and I cannot see, what the difference to which he alluded was. The right hon. Gentleman spoke of certain expressions in the Queen's Speech at the close of last Session, as to the independence and integrity of Turkey, and of certain other expressions in the Queen's Speech at the opening of the present Session, and said that they differ; but I maintain that substantially they mean precisely the same thing. The only difference appears to be that in one we use the words, "without infringing on the integrity and independence of Turkey," and in the other "maintaining" is substituted for "not infringing." The right hon. Gentleman, who knows something of the difficulty of composing Queen's Speeches, ought not to bind us to a particular word in our mode of stating our case. And here let me say that throughout the whole of these proceedings much verbal criticism has been indulged in. The right hon. Gentleman speaks of the Blue Books extending to 1,200 pages, and no doubt they are very full and elaborate; but I will undertake to say that, so carefully has my noble Friend done his work, that perhaps less merely verbal criticism can be made with respect to them than with respect to any other Blue Books extending to the same length and written on any other occasion. Last autumn speeches were made by some of my right hon. Friends near me. I was fortunate enough not to have been a speaker, or I dare say I should have been similarly dealt with; but when one of my right hon. Friends made a speech anywhere his words were compared with the words of other speeches made in other places—a course of criticism which I have yet to learn is conducive to the interests of the country or to the freshness and originality of the Government, and by which a Ministry should not only be tied to a policy, but to the very words and arguments which each Member of it may use. But there was no contradiction in what they said; on the contrary, there was the most complete real agreement in the speeches of my right hon. Friends. Members of the Government may not have so fortunately hit upon a coincidence of arguments and quotations as has been the case with Members of the Opposition, for I remember that on the first night of the Session the noble Lord opposite (the Marquess of Hartington), almost by inspiration, hit upon the exact quotations and despatches which were used by a certain noble Lord in "another place." If it were not that Conferences are not very popular in certain quarters, I should almost have thought that a Conference was held upon the speeches to be made on that occasion, and that an agreement was arrived at. But my right hon. Friends spoke with perfect freedom on passages that do not affect the policy of the Government—and it was only by casuistical and verbal criticism on those passages that that policy was attacked. I, too, will speak perfectly openly upon this subject. I have nothing to add to what my noble Friend said in "another place," but if the right hon. Gentleman would favour me with the Questions he has read, I would rather reply to them having them before me, than from memory.

MR. GLADSTONE, remarking that he was afraid the right hon. Gentleman could not make out the writing, read the following Questions:—First, Whether the words "humiliating position" in the despatch meant the position of a State bound by Treaty to go to war in a certain event, but disabled from it by the national sentiment? Secondly, It having been the opinion of the Government on the 5th of September that they were bound to go to war for Turkey, if that country were attacked by Russia, did they consider that their title to aid her had not been affected by her breach of faith with regard to the promised reforms in her dominions? Lastly, Was that still their opinion, or did they consider that they were now absolved from the obligations which they then asserted were incurred under the Treaty of 1856, and that they were free to act as policy and justice and humanity seemed to advise and require?

MR. GATHORNE HARDY: Well, Sir, I have already answered the right hon. Gentleman's first Question. I say that this despatch did not mean that we were to go to war, certainly not under the Treaty of 1856, and, with respect to the Tripartite Treaty; I have said that circumstances might happen—I do not say that they will—they are certainly very remote—under which this country might be called upon to fulfil its obligations under that Treaty. Then, with respect to the second Question, the right hon. Gentleman wants certain things to put an end to this; but he has finished his speech without telling us what Turkey has done or has not done. Does the right hon. Gentleman mean that Turkey has issued certain Firmans to her subjects, and has not carried them out? If so, at what period did that take place? It is important I should know that, in order to answer the Question. As I have stated, the basis of the Conference was the maintenance of the independence and integrity of Turkey, and I will add that even at the end of the Conference it is quite obvious that the same state of things remained, for General Ignatieff speaks of the very object of the Conference having been to maintain this independence and integrity. The real fact is, the whole proceedings have had that object. It is true, as my noble Friend said “elsewhere,” that a man may put his affairs into the hands of trustees for a while, intending to resume their management himself at a later time, and all that has been done and proposed by the Conference has been of a temporary character, and with a view to restore Turkey to her full independence in the event of her carrying out certain reforms submitted to her. With respect to her integrity it has been just the same. The right hon. Gentleman himself wishes to respect that integrity, but certainly not exactly in the way I should think that integrity ought to be respected. If you were to make Yorkshire an autonomous and tributary State to England, I do not think that England would be the integer that she had been before. If that is the right hon. Gentleman’s view of autonomous tributary States, I am bound to say I cannot agree with him. The subject has been very much narrowed by the right hon. Gentleman. I think I have answered his Questions distinctly and clearly. I hold that, to the end of the Conference, we were bound by the Treaties under which we have been acting since 1856, and which have been confirmed by the Treaty of 1871. We have proclaimed, and I proclaim again, in the strongest language, that we should be wrong in every sense of the word if we were to endeavour to employ material coercion against Turkey. It is a serious thing to draw the sword, and, although I am charged with a particular Department specially charged with military duties, I perhaps feel it the more on that account, and I say most distinctly that I should feel that if, at this period and after what we have said and done, we were to undertake to draw the sword against Turkey for the purpose of material coercion, we should be doing an act for which there would be no justification—an act which ought to bring shame into our faces, because we should have falsified our promises and been faithless to our engagements. Besides, I deny altogether the right or the duty that is said to be imposed upon us by anything which up to this time has occurred. No human being can know what circumstances may arise, and as to the future I decline to give promises or pledges on hypothetical questions. It is sufficient for us to say that as we have promised, so we will perform. We stated when we went into the Conference—and it was distinctly understood—that as the Italians had said to us there must be nothing but moral coercion, so we said all we would employ was the moral pressure at our disposal. And, in the position in which we now stand, we should not only do wrong in connection with the Treaties to which we are parties, but, in my opinion, we should do wrong even to a higher and greater law, for we should do wrong to the first principles of right, we should do wrong to the first principles of religion, if we were to undertake, under the present circumstances, to attempt to govern and to lay down the systems of government for another country by the sword; and without that you could have no material coercion. We have resisted occupation because, like Lord Russell in 1861, we felt that occupation was only the beginning of the end. Do not let it be said, then, that we are without sympathy for the Christian subjects of Turkey. I have said nothing on this subject hitherto, but I venture to say there is no man who has felt more with respect to the sufferings of the Christian population of Turkey than I have done. But I say this, that when we differ as to the means of healing their wrongs and redressing their grievances, that is a totally different thing from any apathy or want of feeling. With respect to those sufferings and grievances, Sir, I trust that this House of Commons—I trust that this country—will remain true to the principle upon which we have generally acted in regard to the internal government of other countries—namely, that the responsibility is far too great for us to lay down accurate rules for them, or to enforce those rules by violence. It was very wise and prudent to endeavour to enforce on Turkey everything necessary for the good of Turkey and for the well-being of the Christian subjects of Turkey, oppressed as I feel they have been for so many years. It was right we should do everything in our power, using all the influence which our long association with Turkey ought to have given us—it was right we should use all that moral pressure, and even yet I hope that that great pressure, combined, as it has been, with the moral pressure from all the other Powers of Europe, will not be without its effect upon Turkey, and that much will be done for the amelioration of the future condition of her Christian subjects. The hon. Member for the Kirkcaldy Burghs, in a pamphlet he has published, has talked of “difficulties solving themselves.” He raises some very extraordinary difficulties, and his answer is that they will probably solve themselves. That may be so in this instance. But this I will say—that, if the knot be difficult to untie, the time has not yet arrived for this country to apply the sword to cut it. And, therefore, I end, Sir, as I began, by saying that, without being obliged to go to war for Turkey, we are pledged, not to Turkey alone, but to Europe at large, to maintain the faith of Treaties which we have no right to violate.

LORD ROBERT MONTAGU thought it important the House should clearly understand what were our Treaties with Turkey, and to what we were bound by them. He confidently asserted that those Treaties did debar us from interfering between the Sultan and his Christian subjects. Many hon. Members would remember the Congress which met in Vienna towards the end of the Crimean War. Count Nesselrode proposed what was then called a consolidation of the rights of the Christians, which was equivalent to the phrase now employed—the “guarantees” for the good government of the Christian subjects of the Porte. Lord Russell refused to agree to the proposal made at the eighth sitting of the Congress, and it was broken up. At the Conference of Paris on the 28th of February, 1856, the Russian Representatives—Count Orloff and Baron Hübner—desired to insert in the Treaty the measures taken by the Ottoman Government regarding the Christians, making the execution of those measures an obligation on the Powers, but without touching the independence of the Porte. Austria, France, England, and Turkey objected, and the Proposal (Protocol II) was withdrawn. On the 25th of March, on Protocol XIV., the proposal was renewed by Baron Brunnow, with the stipulation that it should not give a right of interference to any Power. That was objected to by Lord Clarendon, and at length the proposal of the French Minister, Count Walewski, was adopted, based on the proposition that Russia had no greater interest in the condition of the Christians than any other Power. This became Article IX. of the Treaty. He therefore maintained that the promises of the Sultan did not enter into the contract, and that the Treaty was binding, whether the promises of the Sultan had been carried out or not. He thought the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War had used an unfortunate expression when he spoke of “restoring” Turkey to independence. He surely could not mean by that to imply that the independence of Turkey had been destroyed. He (Lord Robert Montagu) repudiated the right hon. Gentleman’s the Member for Greenwich (Mr. Gladstone’s) interpretation of the effect on a Treaty of the conduct of the party guaranteed. The right hon. Gentleman, speaking at Frome and Taunton concerning the Treaty of Paris of March, 1856, and the “second Treaty, more stringent still, passed a few months after the Treaty of Paris between Austria, France and England,” went on to say:—

“If these Treaties are in force, then we are bound towards Turkey, not only to the general recognition of its general independence and integrity, but likewise to that which is much more important—viz., to a several as well as a joint guarantee. In truth, it is impossible for national engagements to be stronger. . . . If the Treaties are in force, you are bound hand and foot by them. . . . This is, to a great extent, the hinge of the whole subject."

On the 14th of July Lord Derby stated that by the Treaties we are bound to defend the Sultan from murder, but not from suicide; and that meant from murder by the hand of Russia. In despatch No. 1,053 Prince Gortchakoff said that the London Cabinet would adhere to the letter of the stipulations without taking into account the 20 years that had elapsed, and that by these stipulations European action in Turkey had been reduced to impotency; therefore he desired that the independence of Turkey should be made subordinate to what he called the interests of humanity. The verbal promises given by Turkey did not affect the contract, particularly as it was mentioned that those promises were not to give a right of interference. At the Congress of Vienna a Protocol was signed by which Russia undertook to give a free Constitution to Poland, which had not yet received it, and had suffered greater atrocities than Bulgaria; and, nevertheless, the Treaty was still considered binding. That was a complete answer to those who supposed that Treaties ceased to be binding because of the conduct of one of the contracting Powers. He was afraid, however, that Lord Salisbury was a Nobleman who, though he sat in the Cabinet, agreed with the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich. He (Lord Robert Montagu) had gathered some of the opinions of that Nobleman from the great Conservative organ—The Quarterly Review—in which appeared in October, 1874, an article on the Eastern Question, with which, he thought, he had good reason to credit the noble Lord. That article said—

"Already executed on the elder criminal (the Papal throne), that sentence, though delayed, cannot fail of ultimate execution on the younger; and to hinder or delay it is no part of England's duty. . . . To Russia, mistress of the Central Asiatic line, belong of necessity the destinies of Northern Turkey," &c.

After Lord Salisbury had written this, it was not surprising that he should have sent home the despatch of January 4, 1877, in which he said—

ferent interpretations. At the present time it must be interpreted so as to be consistent with the conjoint military and diplomatic action taken in recent years by the Powers who signed the Treaty of Paris. If the Porte had been independent in the sense in which the Guaranteeing Powers are independent, it would not have stood in need of a guarantee. The military sacrifices made by the two Western Powers twenty years ago to save it from destruction, and the Conference which is now being held to avert an analogous danger, would have been an unnecessary interference if Turkey had been a Power which did not depend on the protection of others for its existence."

This argument meant that criminal acts which we were bound not to commit were to determine our future conduct, as if a burglar claimed immunity because he had broken into your house before. If it were to be said that a Power was not independent because it was guaranteed, what became of the independence of Belgium, Holland, and Greece? The results of such an argument would reduce it to an absurdity. The sacrifices we had made for Turkey were not comparable to those we made between 1792 and 1815 for every country in Europe except France; and was it to be said, therefore, that no countries in Europe were independent except England and France? Yet this was the result of the argument the noble Lord had used. It was said that because Turkey had refused to act on our advice, we were no longer bound to carry out Treaties; but surely that was not a legal view of the question. It was obvious to any one looking at the map, that if Turkey fell under the control of Russia, the position of Constantinople, as the key of the Euphrates Valley route to India and of the Red Sea made its possession by Russia a matter of great importance to us, particularly considering what might result from an alliance of Russia with Persia and Afghanistan; and if the Czar could seize Constantinople, he would displace the Greek Patriarch there, who was the acknowledged head of the Greek Christians, not only in Turkey, but in parts of Southern Russia, where they were almost always in rebellion against the Czar. On the 11th of September Lord Derby, in a despatch, said—

"The reasons which induced us to set a value on the territorial integrity of Turkey are permanent and real, and I hold that it is sound policy now as much as it was in 1856 to adhere to that which diplomatists called the territorial status quo. It is possible that the language which is being used may induce foreign politicians and Governments to think that England has changed her mind on that subject. If that impression is produced it will be a misfortune to us and to all the world."

He asked, then, with these dangers in view, whether they could regard with any peace of mind the tendency of Russia to mix herself up in Turkish affairs? He now came to the opinion of Her Majesty's Government with which he did not agree: the Treaties were binding, they said, but the sympathies of England ran counter to them, therefore the Government must stand by and not carry them out. Up to the 19th of May, 1876, and prior to the agitation which followed the atrocities, what did Lord Derby say? Why, in effect it was this—"Do not interfere; stand aside and let them fight;" and to Turkey he said "Use more vigour; commit atrocities, if you will; but for goodness' sake make an end of fighting." He refused to agree to the armistice which was proposed, lest it should be injurious to the military position of the Turkish Government. The late Leader of that House (the Earl of Beaconsfield) held very much the same language. He told them that he enjoyed a civil war above all things, and that he enjoyed it about as much as we did a boxing match, or a debate in the House, or as our forefathers did cockfighting—"Oh! oh"! and laughter. [The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER: On what occasion?] The language which the right hon. Gentleman used on the 13th of November in addressing his constituents was this—

"Possibly it may be in some cases that a civil war may have something to be said for it when it comes to be a struggle between two great forces growing up in an Empire which can find no other solution of their difficulties than the melancholy solution of war."

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: And the allusion to cockfighting, &c. &c.?

LORD ROBERT MONTAGU said, he did not wish to imply that Lord Beaconsfield had used these words. Then came the Bulgarian atrocities, which created so much sympathy in this country. But it was a hysterical paroxysm of philanthropy which he objected to as being got up for the occasion. Why did we not show our philanthropy in 1860, when Russia showed such cruelty to the Poles? Where was our philanthropy when the Russians entered Khiva?

Lord Robert Montagu

It did not then suit our purpose to put forward philanthropic views. It had been said that the newspaper correspondents had exaggerated the cruelties inflicted with the avowed object of creating a strong feeling against Turkey, and a despatch was telegraphed to Sir Henry Elliot, dated August 22, from which he (Lord Robert Montagu) made this quotation—

"To such a pitch as this" [universal feeling of indignation] "risen that in the extreme case of Russia declaring war against Turkey Her Majesty's Government would find it practically impossible to interfere in the defence of the Ottoman Empire. Such an event, by which the sympathies of the nation would be brought into direct opposition to its Treaty engagements, would place England in a most unsatisfactory and even humiliating position."

Sir Henry Elliot on August 29, in reply, said—

"I am assured that the unconcealed object of some of the newspaper correspondents in the tone they have adopted, is to create in England such a strong current of public opinion against the Turks, as to oblige Her Majesty's Government ultimately to abandon the policy which has at all times been followed towards this country; to cease from allowing themselves to be regarded as interested in its maintenance; and to assume the position of protectors of the Christians against their Mussulman oppressors."

On the 5th of September Lord Derby, in a despatch, said he had always maintained that policy, but because the sympathies of the country ran counter to it he was prepared to change it. And this the noble Lord did, although he held that the course they wished to adopt would lead to ruin and destruction. This was acting unlike a statesman whose duty would be to show the danger, and say, his should not be the hand to strike the blow. On the 14th of July the noble Lord, speaking to a deputation, complained that—

"He did not always receive his instructions from his employers beforehand, but was left to guess what it was that they would desire him to do, and he only ascertained their real feeling when he found that he had gone against it."

Even the Chancellor of the Exchequer, whom he (Lord Robert Montagu) regarded as the coming man, on December 14, in the course of a speech made in Devonshire, treated the "atrocities" meetings with some contempt, and said that few Englishmen knew anything about foreign affairs; but he admitted that they were stepping beyond the arrangements of the Treaty of Paris of 1856—interfering in the internal affairs of Turkey—not by the invitation of Turkey, for Turkey objected on the ground that it was contrary to the Treaties. He did not know whether there was any difference in the Cabinet or not, but he was delighted to see that the Earl of Beaconsfield, having escaped from the anxieties of popular election and attained the dignity of an aristocratic altitude, had expressed a somewhat different opinion. The Earl of Beaconsfield said—

“It would be affectation for me to pretend that this” [being backed by the country in their foreign policy] “is the position of Her Majesty’s Government at this moment. . . . This country has arrived at a conclusion” [what, not to fight for Turkey?] “which, in the opinion of Her Majesty’s Government, if carried into effect, would alike be injurious to the permanent interests of England and fatal to any chance of preserving the peace of Europe.”

It appeared, therefore, that the Earl of Beaconsfield was opposed to the views of his Colleagues, but acquiesced in what he considered would be injurious to the permanent interests of England and fatal to any chance of preserving the peace of Europe. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich had spoken of the House of Commons, rolling down the hill at Greenwich; but in his (Lord Robert Montagu’s) opinion, Lord Derby had taken the country and rolled it down the hill at Greenwich into the slough below. He (Lord Robert Montagu) contended that this country must fulfil the contracts into which it had entered at all hazards. At present it appeared as if Treaties were not binding, but were mere waste paper. We had continually disregarded them, and owing to our policy towards Austria in 1859, Denmark in 1863, Hanover and Austria in 1866, and France in 1870, we were without allies. In former days we used to say that such and such Powers were bound by certain Treaties, and used to calculate on their observing them. But now the whole system of Europe rested on big battalions and 100-ton guns. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich boldly said that Treaties were not binding. Her Majesty’s Government had adopted another opinion. They said Treaties were binding, but, as the sympathies of England were adverse, they would not carry them out. The third principle was, that Treaties were binding, and that we ought to carry them out; and that was the right principle. He could not but liken Her Majesty’s Government in this case to the Vanguard. She was steaming slowly in a fog; the Iron Duke was steaming faster behind, and ran her down. The Government thought they would take a middle course, but he predicted that the Liberal party would come behind them and run them down, and sink them.

MR. COURTNEY said, he did not think any question more important or more deserving our attention than that which referred to the nature of the obligations we were under with respect to this Eastern Question, and of the several Conventions and Treaties to which we had agreed. These Conventions and Treaties were the Treaty of March, 1856, and April, 1856, and the Treaty of 1871. A great deal had been made in the country, and something was made this evening by the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War, as to the renewed obligation which the Treaty of 1856 received from the Treaty of 1871. In his opinion, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich made it clear that the act done in 1871 was confined simply to that clause of the Treaty of 1856 which referred to the rights and powers of Russia on the Black Sea; the rest of the Treaty of 1856 it left unaltered. It was quite true that there was a clause in the Treaty of 1871—the clause read by the Secretary of State, the 8th—which said that the high contracting parties renewed and confirmed all the stipulations of the Treaty of March 30, 1856, as well as its annexes. If that renewed confirmation gave the original obligations of the Treaty of 1871 any fresh force, the right hon. Gentleman was entitled to dwell upon it. But, before doing so, he should refer to the Preamble of that very Treaty; and if he did, he would find that the object was to deal with the clauses of the Treaty of 1856 which related to the navigation of the Black Sea and the mouths of the Danube. The Plenipotentiaries of 1871 had nothing else before them than these clauses; and the real meaning of the 8th clause of this Treaty was that what they had done in altering these clauses was without prejudice to the other clauses of the Treaty of 1856. Now, what were the obligations of this Treaty of 1856? There was a point which had not been made very clear as yet, but which ought to be brought out in full light. It was this. We were under certain obligations with respect to the Treaty of March, 1856, but to whom? We were under obligations towards the Guaranteeing Powers, but towards Turkey we were not, and, what was more, we never had been. The obligations which we undertook by that Treaty were obligations towards the co-Guaranteeing Powers; towards Turkey we entered into none. And if this question were asked—"What has become of the obligations of Turkey towards us?" his answer to that question, as to the other, was that Turkey had no obligations to us whatever by that Treaty. That would be rendered plain by the words of the 9th Article. And if Turkey was under no obligations to us, was it to be said that we were under obligations to Turkey. Would it be contended that there was a unilateral obligation? The 9th Article of the Treaty communicated on the part of the Sultan an intention to issue a Firman for the purpose of improving the condition of the Christian subjects of his Empire, and the contracting parties recognized the high value of that communication. But that Article gave the other Powers no rights towards Turkey; and this being so, upon what principle of law could it be contended that those Powers entered into obligations towards Turkey? He was aware that the 7th and 9th Articles had been connected for the purpose of making out mutuality. But Article 7 contained no words to raise a suggestion that we bound ourselves to Turkey. We did, indeed, enter into some obligations towards the other Powers who combined with us. Each of the contracting Powers pledged itself to the other Powers to respect the independence and integrity of Turkey; and we went on to guarantee in common the strict observance of this engagement. But there was no word raising the presumption that we had bound ourselves towards Turkey. The true reading of the document was that, for the sake of the interests of Europe, and not of Turkey, in order to ensure the peace of Europe, we agreed that we would respect the independence and integrity of the Ottoman Empire. The obligation, then, being between the Guaranteeing Powers, could not be appealed to by any one outside them; and if the Guaranteeing Powers chose to retire from that obligation, the obligation, whatever it was, ceased altogether. He rejected, therefore, altogether, the notion that Turkey had deprived herself of the advantages of this Treaty by what she had done. The 9th Article, indeed, said that Turkey was not responsible to us under that Treaty for what she might do. The true view of the matter, then, was this—that if even the instrument might be so construed as to give Turkey any interest under it, she being put under no obligations towards us, it would be what civilians called a nudum pactum, an agreement without a consideration, and therefore binding only as long as we might choose to uphold it. He did not think it necessary to consider the obligations created by the Treaty as between the Powers themselves. As the Foreign Secretary had held in the case of Luxembourg, it had been shown that the obligation taken upon us by the Treaty of 1856 was a common obligation, binding all the Powers to act together, so that if one Power retired there was no obligation upon any of the rest. It might be said that this was an ingenious rather than accurate view of the Treaty, and that if we were really not bound to Turkey under it, nor Turkey to us, how were we to defend even that limited interference with Turkey which was proposed by the Conference? The answer was that States had powers and obligations with respect to one another which were independent of Treaties, and the power exercised at the Conference was derived, not from Treaty, but from the public law of Europe. If there arose in any country a condition of things which threatened the peace of surrounding countries, those countries had a right to interfere as in this case. Such a right had been exercised in many cases, the principle being appealed to sometimes with, sometimes without, a concurrence of facts. This was the principle upon which the three Powers interfered when Poland was a source of continual disquiet to her neighbours. The same principle led to the interference between Belgium and Holland, and to the interference of Austria in the affairs of Northern Italy. It was a principle easily explained by the jurisprudence of any individual State. You need not have recourse to a contrat social to justify you in preventing a person from going about unvaccinated. There was an inherent power in the members of a community to compel any one member to observe the conditions necessary for the public safety. And so in the community of States there was a right on the part of other States to prevent any one of their number from becoming a danger to the peace of Europe. It was upon this ground alone that the Conference was to be justified, and upon this basis alone it must be placed. He would not now enter into the question whether, as a matter of fact, the Conference was justifiable. But the principle was clear, and the ground for our interference did not refer back to the Treaty of 1856. The Tripartite Treaty rested on a different basis. Under that Treaty, France, Austria, and England jointly and severally agreed to guarantee the integrity and independence of the Ottoman Empire, and we were liable to be called upon either by France or Austria to act under that guarantee. In contemplation of that liability Lord Derby had said there was no chance that either of those Powers would so call upon us. He (Mr. Courtney) could not, however, think that the chance of our being required to discharge this liability was so remote as Lord Derby appeared to suppose; and as this guarantee was now prima facie binding upon us, it behoved us to pay special attention to this question in order to see whether we could possibly avert the danger. If Austria called upon us to act with her under the obligation of this Treaty, it would be an exceedingly unsatisfactory answer to say that the people of England did not like the obligation. But was there any existing liability remaining valid in fact? Were we to say that an obligation once entered into was perpetual? That was a question much discussed when Russia announced to us her intention to treat as abrogated the Articles of the Treaty of 1856 relating to the Black Sea. The text writers agreed that it was absurd to suppose that a Treaty was to be binding in all circumstances and under all conditions. He was aware that an awkward Protocol, which had been already mentioned, was agreed to by the Powers in 1871. But, in its unqualified form, neither authority nor reason supported the proposition that any number of States, whether in Europe or anywhere else, agreeing together must be bound for ever and ever by the obligation they then contracted. A high authority, Hefter, maintained that any convention entered into which interfered with the development of the freedom of a civilized people was altogether void. He was not prepared to go to that length, but this seemed to be a sound position—that any convention must be considered to remain in existence only so long as the conditions under which it was contracted remained reasonably the same. Rebus sic stantibus, the obligations remained; but if the circumstances altered, the obligations disappeared. Again, if the obligation were immoral, the obligation was also void. The same doctrine held good in moral philosophy, as any one might see by referring to no more abstruse moralist than Archdeacon Paley. If, then, the obligation under which we lay here was one the execution of which would be immoral, it was thereby void. Now, he believed that for many reasons—both on the ground of the wrong which would be done to South-eastern Europe, the injury which would be done to our own interests, and the total change of circumstances which had occurred since 1856—we were entitled to claim the right of withdrawing from this Treaty with Austria and France. He did not consider that the danger of being called upon to fulfil the obligation of the Treaty was so small as Lord Derby supposed; and he therefore pressed upon the Government the duty of intimating to Austria and to France that we no longer considered ourselves bound by the obligation of the Tripartite Treaty. He did not wish to say to Austria and France that in no circumstances should they act in the way that might be necessary under the strict covenants of the Treaty. All he wanted to suggest was that in the future action should be based upon conscientious views as to the most useful course to be followed, instead of the hands of the Powers being tied by the strict terms of the Treaty to which he was referring. Lord Derby objected to agree with the Berlin Note, because he thought that to do so would bind him to proceed to more efficacious measures. The caution of the noble Lord in reference to this matter was to be admired, though of course it was obvious that he would have had the right to reject those measures if improper. If, however, this country wished not to be bound in reference to the taking of coercive measures on one side there ought to be freedom all round. Let them have freedom in their dealings with South-eastern Europe. Let not this happen, that thereafter Austria should come to them and say—"We cannot stand what is going to be done; we claim your help to prevent it," and then that they (Her Majesty's Government) should have to say—"We cannot interfere." It would be more honest and honourable to insist upon this line of action at the present moment than to let it so far remain open as that at some future time any one of the countries interested should be able to insist upon the carrying out of the guarantees contained in the Tripartite Treaty.

MR. BAILLIE COCHRANE thought the debate would be useful in producing a more accurate definition of our Treaty obligations than at present existed, eliciting as it had done the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War. He would take that opportunity of urging upon the noble Lord the Leader of the Opposition the importance, now that he had evoked a declaration of the policy of Her Majesty's Government, of stating how far he considered himself bound by the speeches made outside by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich, the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Oxford (Sir William Harcourt), and other Members of his Party, and also whether he adhered to the views which he himself expressed on the opening night of the Session. As far as he (Mr. Baillie Cochrane) understood the speeches to which he was referring, they anticipated the arrival of a time when England might be under the necessity of joining Russia in exercising coercion upon Turkey, but if that was their view, was it based upon any Treaty obligation whatever? Could anything in history justify using coercion, based upon humanitarian or other grounds, towards a Government with respect to their action towards their own subjects? During the war of the Spanish Netherlands, notwithstanding the strong feeling in England, they had not interfered. When the Revolution of 1789 took place, and the streets of Paris were flowing with blood, had they recalled their Ambassador? No. When war was declared by the French Republic, yet we did not wage war with France.

Mr. Courtney

In whatever steps we took, it was declared that we would not interfere with the internal affairs of France. To propose any such course was to depart altogether from what he understood as the Liberal tradition; and he was certainly surprised to find among the leaders of the new crusade the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Birmingham and the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Birmingham, the apostle of peace, had said that he would like to join a crusade. A crusade for what? To carry on a war against a great Power and to exterminate the Turks from the face of the earth if possible. He had gone far beyond the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich, who would only have them removed, "bag and baggage." He (Mr. Baillie Cochrane) supposed this meant the expulsion of the Turks from the country. [Mr. GLADSTONE: No.] He believed that it had been explained to mean only a change of Government—[Mr. GLADSTONE: Yes]—and that certainly was not so bad as extermination. The right hon. Gentleman had spoken much about doing certain things in the interest of humanity; but in his speeches, and certainly in his pamphlet, which had been translated into Russian and circulated in that country, he had done so much to mislead the Russian Government that he (Mr. Baillie Cochrane) would go the length of saying that, but for the pamphlet, peace would have been restored before now. It was unlucky in the interests of humanity that the right hon. Gentleman made those speeches and issued that pamphlet, for the Russian Government were misled by the manufactured excitement got up by the right hon. Gentleman—an excitement which was produced by appealing to the generous instincts of the English people, instead of relying upon the only policy which could be regarded as dignified, safe, and worthy of the British nation. In this matter, their's must be an English policy. England had a Colonial and an Indian Empire to maintain, and in doing this one of her first duties was to prevent Russia from taking possession of Constantinople. Had hon. Gentlemen considered what sort of Government they were going to put in the place of the Turkish Government? The Russian Government? He referred to this, because the speech of Lord Shaftesbury delivered in July last, in which he said he would rather see the Russians than the Turks in Constantinople, furnished the key-note to the speeches which had been delivered on the side of the question which he (Mr. Baillie Cochrane) deprecated. What was Lord Shaftesbury's opinion of Russia in 1860? In a debate that occurred in the House of Lords in that year, the noble Lord charged the Russians with having been guilty of foul and horrible outrages, and referred to the pestilential influence of the Russian Government. He wondered, under such circumstances, that the great Party opposite could bring themselves to support the Russian policy, and could ask that this country should take part in coercing Turkey and in supplanting the Turkish by the Russian Government. He was, therefore, happy to have had the opportunity of hearing in that House—though Turkey had not done what was expected of her in respect to her Christian subjects during the past 20 years—from the lips of an influential Member of the Government, that it was not the intention of Her Majesty's Ministers to bind themselves to a policy which would not be creditable to this country.

MR. GRANT DUFF said, that they had heard a good deal of their obligations under the Treaties of 1856; but if they had certain obligations, were they not bound to take adequate means to fulfil them? The first condition with reference to fulfilling those obligations was to have sufficient means of knowing what went on in the Turkish Provinces, and he thought the English Government had not had sufficient information. The right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War had referred to the conduct of the late Government with regard to the suppression of Consulates, and attributed to that suppression the want of means for procuring sufficient information. He (Mr. Grant Duff) did not agree with the right hon. Gentleman on that point. What he contended for was that before the Consulates were suppressed, we had not the means of ascertaining what was going on in Turkey. The system which had been pursued was an imperfect one. What many wanted to know in this and other countries was why, in the midst of profound peace, had the richest country in the world allowed itself to be so incompletely informed with reference to the state of affairs in Turkey as it had been from the end of the reign of the Great Eltchi up to the present time. He was not going to make any reflection whatever upon any one of our Ambassadors, Secretaries, Attachés, or Consuls during that long period. Everybody who had given attention to the subject knew that among these some were good, some were bad, and some were indifferent; but that was not his point. He could not but regret—and the remark applied quite as much to one side of the House as to the other—that, in spite of warnings the most clear and most precise which could be imagined, no Prime Minister and no Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs took the pains to see that the Foreign Office was provided with anything like adequate means of information about the state of things in European Turkey. In the year 1864, the late Lord Strangford, who knew as much about the Eastern Peninsula as almost any then living Englishman, published an extremely brilliant paper, which was read, or should have been read, by everyone who cared about European politics, in which he pointed out how very little accurate information was procurable about Turkey, especially the European part of it, warned the Government of the day that great trouble might at any time arise in that country, and entreated it to spend a little money in strengthening the hands of our Ambassador at Constantinople by giving him the help of a few men whom he might send about to become thoroughly acquainted with the outlying Provinces of that composite Empire, so as to be able to know far more accurately what was going on in distant parts of it, than he could do by means of the existing diplomatic and Consular organization.

Notice taken, that 40 Members were not present; House counted, and 40 Members being found present—

MR. GRANT DUFF proceeded to say that he wanted to know why this proposal was never carried into effect. Perhaps there was some good reason against it. If so, those who from 1864 down to the present had believed that it ought to be adopted might venture to ask if they might hear that reason. But was

Lord Strangford's proposal ever seriously considered at all? He did not believe it, and yet he was as firmly persuaded as he was of his own existence that if it had been considered and adopted when Lord Strangford first proposed it, or even at a much later date, it would have prevented most of the miseries which we were at present deploring. Supposing Lord Strangford's idea had been realized, one of the travelling Secretaries of the Constantinople Embassy would, on his arrival at the capital, after a short sojourn there to learn certain things which he could best learn from the Ambassador and persons in his entourage, have been told off to study on the spot the whole circumstances of the Bulgarian speaking districts both north and south of the Balkan. In two years a man of the proper kind would have had a thorough acquaintance with these, and would all the time have been pouring a stream of information about them, first into the Embassy at Constantinople, and then through it into the Foreign Office. He would have made personal connections all over the country, would have become the friend of the leading Christians and of the leading Mussulmans, and have known everything that was going on. If Sir Henry Elliot had had such a man by him, was it possible to imagine that he would not have been warned of everything that happened last May? Would he not have known all about the intended insurrection, and have been in a position to bring his great influence to bear upon the Porte in order to its being dealt with in a satisfactory manner? A very small sum would have been wanted to give the Foreign Secretary all the information that he could possibly require in order to enable him to deal with any imaginable crisis that could have arisen in the vast dominions of the Sultan. If the clouds which now lay so thick over the European dominions of Turkey passed away without sweeping the Sultan and his Government into destruction, he sincerely hoped that the question whether it was not necessary to strengthen the Constantinople Embassy in the way to which he had alluded would be most anxiously considered; and what was absolutely necessary with regard to Turkey was equally necessary with regard to another great Empire, where some untoward event might at any moment upset the exquisitely-delicate systems of balance upon which its life depended, and bring Europe face to face with difficulties even more terrible than those of to-day, difficulties with which our Foreign Office in its present absence of full information would be perfectly powerless to deal.

MR. PERCY WYNDHAM said, he had listened with great attention to the speech of the right hon. Member for Greenwich (Mr. Gladstone), but he thought that that speech would fail to convince the majority of that House or of the country that the view taken of Treaties by that right hon. Gentleman was to be preferred to their plain and commonly-received interpretation. It was distinctly laid down in the Treaty of 1856 that the Powers were not to have the right either separately or collectively of interfering between the Sultan and his subjects, or in the internal administration of his Empire. He agreed with the hon. Member for the Isle of Wight (Mr. B. Cochrane) that the time had come, early as it was in the Session, when they ought to inquire into the meaning of the tone assumed by the Opposition on the first night of the Session, and also throughout the Recess. Nothing, in his opinion, could be clearer than the conclusion that they had a War Party in this country, although, by a strange coincidence some of its most eminent adherents belonged to the Peace Society. It was not necessary to go far into the speeches of hon. Gentlemen opposite to show that this, although paradoxical, was a true statement. Even the hon. Baronet the Member for Chelsea (Sir Charles Dilke), who did not show in his speech to his constituents any of that virulent animus against Turkey to which they were accustomed, said it would be disgraceful to the Government and the country to retreat behind the arms of Russia from the consequences of Lord Derby's despatch. What did that mean but a threat of coercion? The right hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. John Bright) pointed to the example of the Crusades—not to denounce the barbarity and cruelties of the feudal system—but, as worthy of admiration, and to stir up the religious prejudices of the past, for which purpose he did not scruple also to recall the recollection of Bethany, Calvary, and the Mount of Olives. The Duke of Westminster also, as President of the meeting at St. James's Hall, asked why the Fleet and Army of England were not sent to Constantinople, not to defend it against Russia, but, if necessary, to coerce Turkey? Again, although "the bag-and-baggage" policy did not distinctly appear in all the Recess speeches of the right hon. Member for Greenwich, yet the spirit of that policy underlay the whole of them. The right hon. Gentleman said that his views had never been repudiated at any public meeting; but it was equally obvious that the opinion of the country could not be gathered from the cheers of a few idle persons loafing about railway stations. The people of England were averse to war on that question—not because they did not wish the subjects of Turkey to be better governed, but because they did not see the means by which the object was to be attained. The noble Lord the Leader of the Opposition on the 8th instant taunted the Government with having changed their policy, losing sight of the fact that different circumstances required different language. The noble Lord was also forgetful of the difference in his own key now from that of his speeches last Session. He had listened with great satisfaction to that change of key on the part of the noble Lord, because it showed that he was satisfied in the main with the position this country now occupied on that question. He had also heard with much satisfaction the statements which had come from the Ministerial bench that evening, and he hoped that no pressure which might be applied would cause them to depart from the policy thus announced. The policy of coercion without any intention of putting it in force was not unknown in this country. It was largely in favour with hon. Gentlemen opposite when they were in power. They all remembered, during the progress of the war between France and Germany, when the policy was tried, for which the right hon. Member for Greenwich was chiefly responsible, of seeing what advice would do with Prince Bismarck, accompanied with a threat which there was no intention to put in force—a policy which failed, and deserved to fail, ignominiously, and which brought discredit on this country and on the Ministers who advised it. He did not know whether the Government intended to renew negotiations in any shape now that the Conference had ended; but he hoped that they would not assume an attitude towards Turkey or use any language to the other Powers which would either force them into a cruel war with a friendly Power against the interests and the traditional policy of this country for an end it might be good in itself, but the means of attaining which were dark and inscrutable, or would oblige them to withdraw from plain intentions which they had authoritatively announced.

MR. EVELYN ASHLEY said, he would have been glad to have seen the debate confined to our Treaty engagements; but the hon. Member who had just sat down and the hon. Member for the Isle of Wight (Mr. B. Cochrane), both belonging to the enthusiastic order of foreign politicians, had so greatly misrepresented what had been said by some Members of the Opposition during the Recess that he felt bound to reply to them. It had been sought to make out that many Liberals had advocated the duty of a war against Turkey on behalf of its Christian subjects; and, in fact, desired to carry on a crusade against what might be called a crescentade. They had never said there was any duty of the sort imposed on us—the only duty in the case being for this country never again to support Turkey in maintaining her oppressive dominion over those subject races. But they further said, and he now maintained that if our Government sincerely apprehended such great dangers to the interests of this country as they alleged would arise from a war between Russia and Turkey, then it ought to come forward and prevent that war in the only way it could be prevented—namely, by coercing Turkey to give way to the demands of united Europe. Who could have a doubt that Turkey would have yielded at the Conference if she had known that the greatest naval as well as the greatest military Powers in the world were about to unite against her? And even now, if she knew that the power of England would be exerted against her, she would give way and make peace. It was simply an Ottoman doctrine that they must yield to superior force; but the Turks did not believe that Russia alone was a superior force, and they would not yield at the Conference because they believed they could deal with Russia single-handed. He quite agreed with Lord Derby that we ought not to threaten unless prepared to put our threats into force; but he protested against beginning by saying to those whom we wished to influence in a certain direction that we would not use force to obtain that which we were going to ask for. That was what had happened now. On the 19th December Lord Derby informed the Turkish Ambassador that Her Majesty's Government did not contemplate any measures of active coercion. That was volunteered; and if the House wanted to compare with this a case in which coercion was allowed to remain as possible and see the different effect, they must go back to November, and they would see that the Conference was forced upon Turkey against her will. On the 13th November, 1876, Sir Henry Henry Elliot wrote:—"I replied to the Grand Vizier that it had been decided that there must be a Conference." And if they went still further back, to what occurred in 1860, when French troops were sent to the Lebanon, they would remember how promptly the chief culprits were executed—a great contrast to the wretched results of our despatch of the 21st September. This was the alphabet of the whole thing. Nothing could be got out of the Turkish Government without force; and why not acknowledge it at once? If the Government thought it better to leave Russia to apply force, let them say so. If they believed it to be contrary to our interests to allow that, then they on that side of the House said that it was the duty of the Government to obtain what was wanted in conjunction with Russia and some other Power. The Secretary of State for War had said that the Government did not take action sooner in regard to the atrocities in Bulgaria because they had not sufficient evidence of them at first, and he insinuated that the blame rested with their Predecessors in office—the Liberals—for reducing the number of Consuls in Turkey; but the present Government did not at any rate appear to have missed them, as it was obvious from the reply given to him (Mr. Ashley) on a former occasion last Session by the Prime Minister, after conferring with the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Bourke) that the Foreign Office had received dispatches from the Consul at Philippopoli, although there was no longer one there at that time. The right hon. Gentleman had also observed that "history repeats itself." Well, whether history would repeat itself to the extent of our remaining too long aloof from active interference with regard to the protection of the Christian population of Turkey remained to be seen; but the right hon. Gentleman would do well to remember that the result of the campaigns of 1827-28 was not very favourable to the Turkish Empire. The hon. Member for the Isle of Wight (Mr. Baillie Cochrane) had alluded to some observations of a near relative of his (Mr. Ashley's) as being the head and front of the whole agitation respecting the Bulgarian atrocities. What Lord Shaftesbury had said was, that he would sooner see the Russians at Constantinople than that things should be left as they were, and that nothing should be done.

MR. BAILLIE COCHRANE: The noble Lord's words were, "He would rather see the Russians at Constantinople than the Turks in Europe."

MR. EVELYN ASHLEY said, the context would show that what was meant was, that sooner than that things should remain as they were, he would rather see the Russians at Constantinople than the Turks in Europe. The alternative, however, was not necessarily one between Russia and Turkey—it was between some government and no government at all. The Liberals could have no sympathy with Russia, who was 200 years behind the rest of the world, and ever seeking to increase her overgrown Empire. The reason of the meetings held in the autumn was a general conviction that Her Majesty's Government had failed to convince the Turkish Government of English horror of the massacres, and that this country would not stand by it. Lord Salisbury, in a despatch to Lord Derby, dated December 26, 1876, speaking of his interview with the Sultan, said—

"He appeared to be fully convinced, in spite of my assurances to the contrary, that the alienation of a large portion of the English people was due rather to the repudiation of the Turkish debt than to the atrocities in Bulgaria."

Was it the speeches of Lord Beaconsfield; was it the articles in the Tory Press, which at so late a period led the Sultan to believe that England did not care the least in the world about the atrocities, but was influenced only by the repudia-

“His Majesty laid much stress on a law to which he had assented, by which the repudiation of last year was repealed, though it had not been possible as yet to make any provision for the payment of the debt.”

The Sultan also “dwelt in terms of felicitation on the liberal measures contained in the Constitution,” and His Majesty might also have added, with fitting irony, “though it had not been possible as yet to make any provision for their execution.” One thing, however, was certain—namely, that this country would never allow itself to be drawn into a war to support the domination of Turkey by any technical interpretation of the words of Treaties which, as the hon. Member for Liskeard (Mr. Courtney) had well said, died of inanition, from the exhaustion of the soil in which they had been planted, and under altered circumstances had become of no force.

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF protested against the notion that the protest which had been raised in this country against the horrible acts perpetrated in Bulgaria had emanated less from Members on the Ministerial side than from Gentlemen on the other side of the House. When those questions were the subject of debate last Session, they were discussed by himself and others near him in no Party spirit. He himself had seconded the Amendment of his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Marylebone (Mr. Forsyth), the object of which was to secure guarantees of good government for the Slavonic Christians. He remembered, however, that once when the atrocities of Bulgaria were under consideration there were absent from the front Opposition bench the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich (Mr. Gladstone) and the right hon. Member for the University of London (Mr. Lowe), who had so much distinguished themselves during the Recess. He considered that when the Government were engaged in difficult and delicate negotiations with foreign Powers, in which peace or war was involved, it was the duty of all who desired to maintain the influence of the country to support rather than to thwart the efforts of the Ministry. The duty of the latter was difficult enough without needless obstruction being thrown in their way.

But the Opposition had not acted in accordance with that spirit. The difficulties of the Conservatives, even under such trying circumstances, had proved the opportunity of the Liberals, and they might henceforth expect to find foreign complications made, if possible, the stepping-stone to office. He now maintained that Her Majesty's Government were not responsible for the conduct of Turkey towards her Christian subjects and for other things deemed objectionable in the conduct of Turkish affairs. Sympathy for the Christian subjects of Turkey was not only not a monopoly of hon. Gentlemen sitting on the other side of the House; and if those populations were still in an unfortunate condition, it was owing as much as anything else to the neglect and even the insult with which they and their interests had been treated by successive Liberal Administrations. He would quote, in the first place, from a despatch dated July 3, 1862, from Lord Russell to Sir Henry Bulwer, written with reference to Servian complications existing at that time. Lord Russell wrote—

“All those Powers who signed the Treaty of 1856 must be aware that there exists a conspiracy, scarcely concealed, in all the Provinces of European Turkey to throw off the rule of the Sublime Porte, and to substitute for it some kind of anarchy. Some persons talk of a Slave, some others of a Greek Empire: all look to plunder, to power, to revenge, to bloodshed. In this position of affairs it is incumbent on the Great Powers represented at Constantinople to give the most striking proof of their fidelity to their solemn engagements, their regard for a Power whom they have admitted into the European system, and their determination to preserve unbroken the general peace.”

A Conference was held at Constantinople the same year with regard to the bombardment of Belgrade, and Lord Russell wrote to Lord Napier on the 10th of July, 1862—

“I have to instruct you to state to Prince Gortchakoff that Her Majesty is determined, in the Conference, proposed at Constantinople, to maintain the engagements contracted by Her Majesty in the Treaty of Paris of 1856.”

At that time exactly the same remonstrances were made by the Court of St. Petersburg with reference to the Christian provinces of Turkey as had lately been made; and if Her Majesty's Government were to blame for the course they had adopted, it must be for following the precedent set by Lord

Russell and his Colleagues. There was a despatch he would read from, which had never been officially published, but which appeared in the newspapers in 1862 at a time when public attention was occupied by other topics—chiefly by the American War—and little regard was paid to Eastern questions. There had been a rebellion in Herzegovina, simultaneously with the bombardment of Belgrade, but having nothing to do with that event; and after strong representations had been made on the subject by the Court of St. Petersburg, Lord Russell wrote, on the 30th of September, 1862, to Her Majesty's Representative at that Court—

“Her Majesty's Government have to express their regret that they cannot agree with the views of Prince Gortchakoff either on the general question of interference in the affairs of Turkey or in the particular question of Montenegro. Her Majesty's Government have always understood that when Turkey was allowed to form part of the system of Europe she was to have all the advantages and be liable to all the duties of an independent State. She was, in short, to be as independent as Prussia or Portugal, Sweden or Saxony, and, on the other hand, to be bound like those States, by the faith of Treaties and the ties of international comity and goodwill. If this be so, it is not justifiable when Treaties are silent to interfere without necessity or provocation in a case where an insurrection has broken out in Turkey, and that insurrection has been supported by a neighbouring Prince. Such was the case in Herzegovina, where an insurrection broke out, and in Montenegro, from which it was fomented and supported. If the Prince of Montenegro was a vassal, the Sultan had a right to reduce him to obedience and to impose such conditions as will secure that obedience for the future. If he was an independent Prince, the Sultan had a right to force him to accept such terms of peace as would prevent a renewal of such aggression. . . . I will not conclude without giving, in a few words, the views taken by Her Majesty's Government of what is going on in Turkey. If the Slavonic and Greek subjects of the Sultan rise in insurrection and that insurrection is suppressed, the weight of authority will be made heavier, privileges will be withdrawn, and the money which ought to be expended in making roads and harbours, and in promoting improvement, will be diverted to the pay and maintenance of a large military force. If, on the other hand, the darling scheme entertained in some quarters of overthrowing the Turkish rule should be successful, Greeks and Slavonics will quarrel, each Province will claim supremacy, civil war will ravage the counties where the authority of the Sultan shall have been thrown off, and an appeal will be made to the Great Powers of Europe to put an end to this anarchy by dividing among themselves the Turkish Provinces. But the European Powers would hardly be able to perform this task without giving rise to fresh conflicts—

probably to a general war. Such are the views which induce Her Majesty's Government, while sincerely desirous of improving the condition of the Christian subjects of the Porte, to refuse all countenance to projects which in Greece go by the name of the ‘great idea,’ and which, whether Greek or Slavonic, tend to the disruption of all existing ties of allegiance in the Turkish Empire, and are more or less connected with the criminal intrigues of which Turkey feels the effects in Servia, and which aim no less at the subversion of every Monarchy in Europe than at the integrity of the Ottoman Empire.”

That despatch was written by a Member of a Government to which belonged the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich and the Duke of Argyll; and he thought that before they ventured to utter such taunts against the Government, and to bring to bear upon them the terror of their influence throughout the country, which had been so strongly manifested in that House that night, he thought they should take a little pains to read up the history of the past. The policy indicated in that despatch was defended by the right hon. Member for Greenwich himself, who, on May 29, 1863, in the absence of Lord Palmerston, said in this House—

“It is not now necessary to go back to a discussion of the causes of the Crimean War, but I am bound to say that when we speak of non-intervention in Turkey—when we speak of repudiating all ideas of resisting the natural and general development in force, numbers, and intelligence of the Christians of that Empire—we by no means mean to assert that the ancient policy of this country is to be repudiated, and that we hold it henceforth a matter of indifference what schemes are formed by any foreign Power against the existence, or against the territorial independence, of the Ottoman Government. And I am bound to say also, that while a real and lively sympathy does exist throughout the country for the Christian population of Turkey, on the other hand there does exist a belief that the principles on which the Crimean War was waged were sound principles. . . . Let us endeavour to inculcate on the Ottoman Government a spirit of liberality and justice, so as to induce it to seek its strength rather in the mild and equitable treatment of its Christian subjects, than in straining its power against them; but let us remember that with the general obligations of humanity and prudence in regard to the subjects of that Government must be combined those special obligations of good faith which we have undertaken towards the ruling authority itself.”—[3 Hansard, clxxi. 145-147.]

The same policy on the part of the Liberal Party could be traced up to the time of the Treaty of 1871. It must be borne in mind that meanwhile Reports were regularly received from the Consuls about the state of the Christian

Provinces, and that those Reports showed as then existing the very same grievances which ultimately caused the people to rise—namely, denial of justice, the oppression of the zaptiehs, and grinding taxation. The right hon. Member for Greenwich said the other day in an off-hand way, when the Chancellor of the Exchequer alluded to the Treaty of 1871, the Government were not bound in making such a Treaty to know the state of every province in the Empire. This was a curious doctrine. As a matter of fact, the Government declared that it did know the state of the Provinces in question. But to show what the views of the right hon. Gentleman and of the Liberal Government were in 1871, he would read an extract from the proceedings of the House on March 30 in that year. Lord Enfield said, in answer to a Question—

“The sacrifices of this country during the Crimean War of treasure, and the yet more precious sacrifice of blood, had not been thrown away. The position of Turkey since the Crimean War had been ameliorated. Turkey had been able to equip, man, and hold a Navy which was in a creditable state of efficiency, and her Army was in such a condition as would enable her to hold her own against hostile visitors. The internal condition of Turkey had also improved since the Crimean War. The Danubian Provinces had secured autonomy; the Christian population and subjects of the Porte were no longer as hostile to her rule as formerly. . . . It (the Treaty) assured her (Turkey) of the material support of her allies, not only in times of actual and existing danger, but when danger might only be apprehended.”—[3 Hansard, ccv. 965-971.]

The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich also spoke on that occasion, and said he was perfectly satisfied so far as the position of the question was concerned in connection with the action of the Government, to let it rest on the speech of his noble Friend the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs. It was clear, therefore, that the state of Turkey appeared to the right hon. Gentleman then to be satisfactory, notwithstanding the Consular reports, and the Treaty was, in consequence, renewed, and she received increased guarantees. If the Government of that day now disowned all knowledge at that time of the state of the Turkish Empire, why had a favourable construction been then alleged as the reason of the Treaty? But up to a later date the policy of Her Majesty's present

Advisers was approved by right hon. Gentlemen opposite; and he was, therefore, at a loss to understand why it was that the noble Lord the Leader of the Opposition in that House the other day took the Government to task for the despatches which had been written before the Recess. The noble Lord gave his approval to the action of the Government up to the 31st of July last, when he disappeared from the House to find himself, no doubt, in some pleasanter quarter. The noble Lord, on the occasion to which he referred, used these words—

“From what I have said it will be clearly seen that I have no desire to place upon record any condemnation of the conduct of the Government. I think that, in the main, the policy which they have adopted is right.”—[3 Hansard, ccxxxi. 224.]

Coming from the Government side of the House that language would have been considered a general approval of the policy of the Government—coming from the noble Lord it was a positive benediction. He could not, however, conceive anything more calculated to damage the character of public men than the attacks made on the speech delivered on the 9th of November by Lord Beaconsfield at the Mansion House. We were at that time about to enter into the Conference. Lord Beaconsfield knew that the Russian Army had been mobilized, and that large masses of troops had been collected in the Caucasus, and wherever they could be placed in a menacing position to Turkey. He also was aware that the Austrian Army was in a state of high efficiency, and that France, Italy, and Germany were heavily armed. It was, therefore, the duty of Lord Beaconsfield to point out that we were not going into the Conference with fear; but that, so far as our ability to carry on a war was concerned, we were on a footing with the most powerful nation. Last year, when a discussion had been raised by the hon. Member for Dundee (Mr. E. Jenkins), he (Sir H. Drummond Wolff) had said that our position was analogous to that in which we stood in 1853, when the Russians had crossed the Pruth, seeing that the Serbians had crossed the Drina and that our fleet had been sent to Besika Bay, where, if it had been sent sooner in 1853, the Crimean War, as had since been admitted by a Russian diplomatist, would never have occurred. There were certain analogies also in the case of speeches at the Mansion House. It was notorious that we had drifted into the Crimean War owing to the vacillation and the timid utterances of Lord Aberdeen's Government. That noble Lord, on the 9th of November, 1853, made a speech at the Mansion House in which he said—

“In a country such as ours, and in a height of civilization such as that in which we live, the real triumphs of a Minister must consist in promoting the progress of industry and the development of the national resources. Such a course is the object of Her Majesty's present Government. I trust that nothing may happen to impede our onward progress, and that whatever reforms may be necessary will be carried on in the absence of any disturbing causes, whether foreign or domestic. When last I stood up in this room as the guest of your Lordship's predecessor, I declared that the policy of Her Majesty's Government was a policy of peace. I desire now to repeat that declaration, and I go further and say that no other principle of policy will ever be announced by me. But, emphatic as those words may be, let me not be understood as conceiving the impolicy of war, because the occasion may arise when war cannot be avoided, except at the expense of our country's honour. All I can say is that, as far as I am concerned, war will never be undertaken except with reluctance and when imperatively demanded by the honour and interest of the country. Such I believe to be the duty of an English Minister as I am sure it is that of a Christian man.”

But that very morning Lord Aberdeen had received a manifesto showing that war had been declared by Russia against Turkey, and two days before a Circular had been sent to Her Majesty's Ambassadors abroad stating that the English and French Fleets had been ordered to enter the Dardanelles. Within three weeks occurred the disasters of Sinope. Which, then, he should like to know, was the more likely to preserve the honour and interests of the country, the speech of Lord Aberdeen in 1853, or that of Lord Beaconsfield in 1876? And if the speech of the latter noble Lord was felt to be a menace to Russia—which it was never intended to be—it was only because for Party purposes attention had been called to his words by right hon. Gentlemen opposite and some less prudent practitioners who “darkened wisdom with words without knowledge.” As to the discussion of that evening and the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich, what struck him most about them was that they really meant nothing. He might say the same of the right hon. Gentleman's Questions, which were answered by his right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for War, who gave great proof of his capacity in being able to reply to inquiries so hazily conceived. As to our policy, he believed the proper course to pursue was to maintain concert with the other Powers and neutrality, but armed neutrality, as at the present moment. There was, however, great difficulty in preserving that concert, and the reticence shown by the Government as to the reports from Germany and France, showed how delicate was the task. In that absence of concert he would ask hon. Gentlemen opposite did they intend to act with Russia alone? And here he would remind those who, like a noble Duke in “another place,” urged the adoption of a course similar to that which was taken in the case of Syria, that there had been great difficulty in terminating the occupation of that country by foreign troops, although France had to send her soldiers to a great distance from their centre. If, then, Russian troops were once to enter the insurgent Provinces of Turkey, the difficulty of getting them out again, the House might rest assured, would be more formidable than hon. Gentlemen opposite perhaps foresaw. He, at the same time, had a great admiration for Russia and for her Ruler. He admired the devotion of the Russian people to the Czar and to their religion; but unfortunately that devotion too often showed itself in a desire to extend their Sovereign's dominion over territories which were not his, while their religious fervour was strongly tinged with political rapacity. He believed the peaceful professions of the Czar were sincere, but the Russian people were often too strong for the Government. He could not forget the incorporation of Khiva, notwithstanding promises which had been made, nor the fact that in 1853, after the Russian Government declared that it had no intention of attacking Turkey, they immediately destroyed the Turkish fleet at Sinope. “But,” as Lord Palmerston said in March, 1854—

“The real question is, not what you would wish to see established in the Turkish Empire, but that which you are determined shall not be established—it is not what might be, but what, for the interest of all Europe, ought not to be. And that which ought not to be, and that which I trust Europe will take care shall not be, is the transfer of those countries to the sceptre of the

Emperor of Russia." — [3 Hansard, cxxxii. 278.]

He had but a very few words to add. He did not appeal to the mercy or forbearance of hon. Gentlemen opposite. If they could displace the Government, let them do it. But they could not, for he knew that the Government was supported by Parliament and the country, with the exception of one or two little boroughs, which were of scarcely any consequence. The country desired to continue Her Majesty's present Advisers in office, because it could not hand over its interests to men whose vacillation had brought on the Crimean War, or who were steeped to the chin in the humiliation of the Alabama Treaty. If the question were ever brought to issue, it would, at all events, be decided not by the cries of partizan disappointment, not by the petulance of tempestuous Dukes, nor by the balderdash of provincial Reform Clubs, but by the calm and deliberate perception and the earnest recognition by a Representative Assembly of a righteous policy and a sterling national purpose.

MR. WHITWORTH stated that having been for 18 years in the service of Russia on the shores of the Black Sea, he might perhaps be permitted to say that that Power was but very little known, either by the House or by the Government. In dealing with the Government of Russia they were dealing with men of the highest rank; but with the exception of the Emperor, who was the best man in his dominions, he had no hesitation in saying that the Members of the Government were adepts in lying—that they were full of deception, and that if any Minister believed what they said, unless it answered their own purpose, he would be very much mistaken. Although Turkey was bad enough, unfair blame had been cast upon her. To his own knowledge there had not been a good Governor in Servia, Bosnia, or Herzegovina, whom Russian corruption had not soon got hold of. All the advantages she had gained in those countries had been obtained by bribery and corruption. It had always been the case with Russia. These were matters which ought to be borne in mind. If he had a choice as to whether the Turks or Russians should have Constantinople, he should say the Turks. They were truthful and honourable, which was more than could be said of the Russians. In his opinion, if Her Majesty's Ministers had not sent the Fleet to Besika Bay, there would have been war long before now. If Russia knew that Turkey would be assisted by any European Power, she would consider a good deal before she went to war, for any European Power could crush her easily. He did not think she was a formidable naval Power. He was interred in Moscow in 1854-6, during the Crimean War; and, although it was said that Russia did not suspend cash payments, people had to pay 20 per cent in exchanging notes for gold. Moreover, if anyone went to the Bank to change a £5 note, he had to wait four hours before he got the money. He liked the Russian people, and he knew no nation that would be more useful to England than Russia, if only she would give up her aggressive designs. England would also be very useful to her, for she had many things which we wanted, and we had hundreds of things which she wanted. For instance, he did not know of a single invention of any sort that ever emanated from Russia, and he did not think any hon. Member could mention one. The same could not be said of any other nation in Europe. He would give an instance of the ignorance of the English Government—or rather of their servants—at the time of the Crimean War. When the English Fleet appeared at the mouth of a river, and remained there five or six weeks, a single frigate might have sailed up the river to the town, and have destroyed everything there; but, when he suggested it to the officers, they said they could not get up the river. These things ought to be known. They could not let Russia take possession of Constantinople. He did not know a greater evil that could happen to Europe. With respect to atrocities, it was a repulsive subject; but he had mentioned to many people facts that he had known himself, injuries inflicted by their own people upon honourable married women, as bad as ever were inflicted by the Turks. Therefore, if anyone were to say—"Fight for Constantinople," he would fight. He believed no greater misfortune could befall Europe than the extension of Russian rule to Constantinople.

MR. FORSYTH said, that after the speech of his right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for War, he found it difficult to understand what the Treaty engagements were which, in the words of Lord Derby's despatch, might "place England in a most unsatisfactory and even humiliating position," because "the sympathies of the nation would be brought into direct opposition to those engagements." The only Treaties that could be alluded to in the despatch were the Tripartite Treaty of 1856 between England, Austria, and France, and the Treaty of Paris of the same year, and he did not think that Lord Derby had referred to the former, for it was an almost impossible contingency that Austria and France should call upon England to go to war in defence of Turkey. Besides, in a despatch of the 6th December, 1876, to the Marquess of Salisbury, Lord Derby said that though this country would not use any military or naval force against the Porte, yet the Government of Turkey must understand that they must not expect any assistance from England. That was said, notwithstanding the Tripartite Treaty which he had just referred to. Could the despatch apply to the Treaty of Paris of 1856? The Secretary for War had said that that Treaty did not bind this country to go to war for Turkey; and, therefore, in neither case could the attitude of this country in the autumn be the cause of any peril to our Treaty engagements. It had been argued with great force that that Treaty did not bind this country to go to war for Turkey, but what it did was this—England, Austria, France, Prussia, Russia, and Sardinia engaged to guarantee the independence and territorial integrity of the Ottoman Empire. They promised and guaranteed so much at all events. Now, there had been no question throughout these discussions about the territorial integrity of Turkey, which meant that the Porte should have titular sovereignty over the provinces, whatever might be the local administration. The right hon. Member for Greenwich (Mr. Gladstone) in May last said he was not ashamed to state that he would maintain the territorial integrity of the Turkish Empire. Then, as to its independence. What had been done during the past 18 months? It was laid down by Wheaton and other jurists that every foreign State might freely exercise its own rights without interference, and yet he found that instructions were sent to Lord Salisbury which would lead to the most direct interference with the Ottoman Government, and Turkey had protested against this as an attack upon her independence. He did not say that Her Majesty's Government were wrong; on the contrary, he thought, they were right, but it was an interference with the independence of the Porte. By the common law of nations they had no right to interfere with each other, and the Treaty of Paris made that stronger. His object was to point out that as they had gone so far they need not be very squeamish in going still farther. He said that this country was in this dilemma—either it was bound by Treaty not to interfere, in which case it had broken that Treaty already, or it might deal with the Ottoman Government free from any Treaty engagement whatever, except that of the Tripartite Treaty, which Lord Derby said would not be put in force. Taken from any point of view, the hands of the Government of this country were practically free, and England might follow the dictates of justice and humanity. The agitation of last autumn had been much misrepresented and unfairly attacked. He took no part in that agitation because he did not want to do anything that might have the semblance of hostility to the Government. And whatever some impetuous orators might have said, there was no wish on the part of the great majority of the speakers to displace the Ministry. The people having had no distinct declaration of the intention of the Government not to go to war in favour of Turkey, thought it necessary to express the feeling of the nation. Lord Derby said to a deputation, which he (Mr. Forsyth) had himself attended, that he wished to know the feeling of the people of England; and it was not unnatural that when the minds of the people were stirred to their inmost depths by what had taken place in Bulgaria, they should resolve that, come what would, they would not go to war in defence of Turkey.

MR. P. J. SMYTH: Sir, as this Eastern Question presents itself to my mind as one of nationality, the House, I am sure, will extend to me for a few moments its indulgence. It is evident from the speeches of the right hon. Gentleman, the Member for Greenwich, and of the right hon. Gentleman, the Secretary of State for War, that the line of demarcation between Government and Opposition must be more clearly defined than at present, before either Party can venture to indulge in the language of censure, or lay claim to be the true exponent of the national feeling. Both Parties are animated by an intense desire for peace—peace, I should say, almost at any price; and the difference in policy, if any real difference there be, has regard, not to the end, but to the means by which that end may be most effectively secured. The noble Earl, the head of the Government, in the early stage of the complication, conceived (and it must be acknowledged not without a show of reason) that the best way to preserve peace was to present a bold front to Russia; while Leaders of the Opposition imagined that the best way to attain the same end was to threaten Turkey. The threats (some of them at least) are very fierce on paper; but if examined minutely, they will appear to be harmless enough. The Liberal Party said, in effect, to Turkey—"We have sustained you so long, but your Bulgarian atrocities are more than we can sanction. If you imagine that for the sake of a traditional policy we will turn Bashi-Bazouks, and aid you in the perpetration of nameless horrors, you are mistaken. Our high morality forbids us going that length, and we indignantly disclaim all responsibility for such practices." Such, so far as I am able to make out, was the policy, and such the morality, of the Liberal Party—a policy of "Cease to do evil," but unequal as yet to the morality of "Learn to do well." At present the policies, or no-policies, of both sides of this House, bear so close a family likeness, that it is impossible to distinguish between Cossacks and Osmanli in this House. The technical point under consideration obliges us to look further back than the Aylesbury speech, or the Guildhall speech, or the Conference at St. James's Hall—to the time when the right hon. Gentleman, the Member for Birmingham, uplifted his voice in this House in manly protest against a wanton war. Russia crossed the Pruth in virtue of a Treaty right, as the acknowledged protector of the Christian subjects of the Porte, who stood in need of protection then as now, and I totally deny that a regard for the welfare of these oppressed people entered into the motives of the allies. The motive of the Emperor of the French was purely dynastic—for French interests pointed then, as they point now, rather to alliance with Russia; the motive of Piedmont was Italian unification; and the motive of England was jealousy of Russia. The Treaty of Peace explains very clearly the motives of the Allies and the real objects of the war. It crippled Russia, it exalted Turkey, and it placed the Christian populations in a more helpless condition than before. So solicitous, indeed, did the Powers show themselves to be for the welfare of the poor Christians, that they emphatically abdicated all right to intervene for their protection in the future. They consigned them to the tender mercies of a Hatti-Houmayoun—whatever that means; but they bound themselves individually and collectively to abstain from interference in the internal affairs of Turkey, and to support her independence and integrity. The Hatti-Houmayoun was from the first a dead letter; yet in face of that fact, that notorious fact, we find the Treaty of 1856 renewed in 1871, and by the right hon. Gentleman, who now, in terms no less just than severe, denounces the crimes of Turkey—crimes, nevertheless, directly traceable, in no small degree, to that Treaty of 1856 and that renewal of 1871. I do not pretend to fathom the statesmanship, that having guaranteed the independence and integrity of the Ottoman Empire, that having condoned the violation of the Hatti-Houmayoun, commissions its Plenipotentiaries at Constantinople to turn the household of Turkey in Europe inside out, and arrange and disarrange everything from the kitchen to the garret. That the Powers individually and collectively, Treaty or no Treaty, had a moral right to remonstrate with Turkey, and suggest improvements, is a proposition which does not stand in need of demonstration; but it is by no means clear that the Conference, in adopting as its basis the Treaty of 1856, and as its first principle the independence and integrity of the Ottoman Empire, did not occupy from first to last an illegal position. A consciousness, indeed, of this illegality evidently weighed on the Plenipotentiaries throughout, for when the Porte objected that this proposition affected its independence, and its integrity, they felt that they had no resource but to give way; and so concession followed concession on a sliding scale—minimum, reducible minimum, irreducible minimum—till the European concert, which opened with a flourish of trumpets, closed with a penny whistle. I do not share the regrets expressed at what is termed the failure of the Conference. Its success I should have regarded as a calamity, for it would have prejudiced most materially the cause of the oppressed peoples by what would have been construed as a declaration on the part of Europe that with such a modicum of reform they ought to be satisfied, and it would have operated as a renewal of the lease of Turkish domination in Europe. Now, happily, all parties are free, and there is an end, no less by the action of the Porte itself, than of the Western Powers, of the Treaty of Paris. I hope that this Eastern Question will come before this House in a more regular form, and I am confident that, discarding Party considerations, and unterrified by the spectre of Panslavism, it will rise to the level of this great argument, and bring to bear on the discussion the light of those principles which give to this House its dignity, and will cause its voice to fall on the hearts of Kings and peoples as the echo of humanity. In the political system there are not only States but peoples, not only Powers but nations, and the most important consideration is, how are these latter affected by the Treaties in question? For though, Panslavism is indeed a fiction, a thing as baseless as the fabric of a vision, Slavism on the Save, the Danube, and the Drina is a reality, a fact, a verity. It struck its roots there before the Turk set foot in Europe, and four centuries of foreign domination have failed to eradicate it. A single battle has often sufficed to end a dynasty or overwhelm an Empire, but it has never in the world's history destroyed a nationality. An Empire went down at Kossova, but the soul that informed it found in Montenegro a refuge and a home. That soul passed into Serbia, and when on that Palm Sunday, in 1815, Milosch unfurled in the church of Takovo the national flag, she sprang to her feet, and with the cry "Time and my right," flung the Crescent from the Rudrik mountains. Among the rugged mountains of North Albania a gallant tribe have preserved, pure and untarnished, alike the faith which St. Paul preached to the Thessalonians and the sword which Scanderbeg waved on 20 fields of victory. With Serbia free, with Montenegro free, with Moldavia and Wallachia free, what can justify the belief in any rational mind that Bosnia, the Herzegovina, and Bulgaria can continue enslaved. The Bosnians and the Herzegovene are one in race, in faith, in language, and in history with the Montenegrins and the Servians—why should they not be one in freedom? It is not alleged that the Bulgarians are inferior in physical, moral, and intellectual attributes to the Wallaches—why should their political condition be one of degrading inferiority? We behold at the Antipodes a cluster of young free States, happy and prosperous in the enjoyment of equal liberties, and owning free allegiance to the common Crown of this world-embracing Empire. Let us suppose, for a moment, that the responsible Government, which all now possess, had been conferred on two or three only of these colonies as the reward of successful rebellion, while their sister colonies continued to be governed as vilayets by Pashas from Downing Street—what would be the consequences? That the Bosnias and Herzegovinas of Australia would rise, that the Montenegrins and the Servians would make common cause with them, and that a united people in arms would face the alternative of a common subjection or a common freedom. No matter what the diversity of race, the same passions operate, the same interests prevail, the wide world over. The principles of right, justice, and equality are unaffected by degrees of latitude and longitude. Self-government and foreign domination in south-eastern Europe have borne respectively their natural fruits. Roumania, Montenegro, and Serbia are comparatively prosperous and progressive, because of their freedom; Bosnia, the Herzegovina, and Bulgaria are withered and decrepid because of their servitude. Is it not manifest that this absurd and ruinous inequality must end, and that all must be reduced to the same level of subjection, or lifted to the same eminence of freedom? A common subjection being an impossibility, common freedom is a necessity. What, then, is the Eastern Question? It is not Russian domination—the Czar disclaims it, the Slavs would not brook it, Europe would oppose it. It is not Austrian domination—Austro-

Hungary disclaims it, the Slavs would not tolerate it, Europe would resist it. It is not Christianity against Islamism, for the gates of Janus were closed when the Prince of Peace was born. It is not the constitutionalism of Midhat Pasha, the sunburst of the Guildhall, or the humanitarianism of St. James's Hall. It is simply national independence as represented by Servia and Montenegro against foreign domination as represented by Turkey. If the provinces would unanimously agree to accept the nominal Suzerainty of the Porte, there would appear to be no insuperable obstacle in the way of a pacific solution. But that is a matter which rests entirely with the populations themselves, and which they must decide for themselves in a spirit of absolute freedom from external control. It must be assumed that they are the true judges of the degree of political independence which would satisfy their national aspirations; and these aspirations, whatever they be, should be the barometer of Europe in their regard. In any event it must be admitted that they have fulfilled the conditions which could alone justify European intervention. They have put their case clearly and intelligibly before the world; they have proved the reality of their grievances and the sincerity of their patriotism; they have risen, they have faced the hazards and the sufferings of war; they have enkindled a conflagration, whose glare is reflected from the walls of all the palaces and all the halls of legislation—these are the conditions, and they have been fully complied with. Is it reasonable to suppose that a people who have challenged the arbitrament of the sword, who have deliberately encountered the desperate risks of a war of independence, and who have not been beaten, will placidly accept a measure of administrative reform emanating from Constantinople, as a panacea for their wrongs and a fulfilment of their aspirations? They were in arms when the Andrassy Note was endorsed by the Powers and accepted by the Porte; yet they did not lay down their arms, but fought on more desperately than before. They rose, not to wrest a Magna Charta from a Sovereign whose sceptre they acknowledge, but to sever the connection with an Empire whose sway they repudiate. Had representatives of the Slavs and the Greeks been admitted to the Conference, much valuable time would have been saved, for I have no doubt that they would have informed the Plenipotentiaries that what their countrymen required was not an ameliorated servitude, an improved provincialism, a mollified subjection, but liberty, independence, and their lands; and that they were making bricks without straw in attempting, out of such materials as their pourparlers, their menaces, their concessions, their reforms, and their Protocols, to construct an edifice of peace. But it must be borne in mind that this Eastern Question has also an Hellenic aspect—that there is, as the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Gladstone) has taught us, an Hellenic factor in the Eastern problem. And how will the Greeks be affected by the Treaties under discussion? The intelligence of her sons, her history, the wrongs inflicted by the Turks, the bloodshed in the War of Independence—all forbid Greece to rest, while Grecian lands, where the Greek element preponderates, are held and ruled as Turkish Provinces. There are no people in the world among whom the sentiment of national unity more largely prevails than the modern Greeks, and the common aspiration of them all is the establishment of a Kingdom which shall embrace the whole of the Greek race. From whatever island or shore they hail, whether from Candia, or Macedonia, or Thessaly, or Epirus, they all consider themselves to be as rightful citizens of the Kingdom of Greece as if they had been born within the narrow limits imposed by European diplomacy as the boundaries of the Hellenic Kingdom. The Greeks cherish a grateful recollection of George Canning; they have reason also to feel grateful to General Maison, who commanded the French auxiliary force in the Morea; and reason above all to hold in reverence the memory of the Emperor Nicholas, who, with his sword-hilt, stamped at Adrianople the Charter of the independence of Greece; but they have little reason to feel grateful to those diplomatists who, after one of the most heroic struggles on record, handed them over a kingdom restricted to the dimensions of a municipality. Pericles advised the Athenians to base their greatness rather on money and ships than on population and territory; but our modern diplomatists evidently expected the Hellenic Kingdom to spring into greatness without either territory or population, while she drew her money and ships from the Clouds of Aristophanes. Or, perhaps, anticipating the discoveries of Dr. Schliemann, they intended Greece should fatten on the bones of Agamemnon. I am not unmindful of the cession of the Septinsular Republic, or Ionian Isles; but that tardy surrender was made at a time, and under circumstances, that deprived the act of half its value and all its grace. The indiscreet disclosure of Sir John Young's despatch left the British Government no alternative but to withdraw as the nominal protector, or remain as the avowed oppressor of the Ionians. It chose the better and the more prudent course. And now there are some magnanimous critics who delight to contend that the Hellenic Kingdom has failed to fulfil the expectations of its generous patrons, the diplomatists of England, France, and Russia. I know not what those expectations may have been, but it is susceptible of the clearest proof that Greece has fully justified the hopes of her real friends. If we regard her materially, by the light of official documents, it will be found that in population, trade, shipping; imports and exports, she has, within the period from 1834 to the present date, progressed in a ratio greatly exceeding that of most European States. Athens has been entirely rebuilt since the termination of the War of Independence. I have been assured that 50 years ago there was scarcely a house standing in Athens. If we regard her intellectually, her national University at Athens will compare not unfavourably with some more venerable and richly endowed institutions of learning. Every town of any importance in the Kingdom has its Lyceum for intermediate education, supported by the State, and the communal schools bring primary education within the reach of every Hellenic child. The English critic at least ought to be sparing in his comments, when he is reminded that even under the reign of King Otho, more money was applied annually to public instruction by the Greek Legislature, than was voted annually down to 1831 by the Parliament of Great Britain in aid of the education of the English people. In truth, the intellectual activity and development displayed by the Greeks are wonderful amongst a population so recently escaped from bondage. I question if, regard being had to population, the modern literature of Greece, that which has sprung up in a few years under the inspiring influence of freedom, will suffer greatly in comparison with that of any country in the world. In whatever aspect viewed, then, the Hellenic Kingdom, most unwisely and unjustly restricted as it was in dimensions, must be recognized as a conspicuous political success, a beacon light to the whole Hellenic race, and an inspiring example to the oppressed of every clime. Had the poet-hero of Missolonghi, like his comrade, the gallant swordsman General Church, lived to see the tree of liberty which he planted put forth such foliage, he would be the first to testify that his fondest dreams had been more than realized in the Greece of King George. Among the monuments that adorn or disfigure—it is a matter of taste—this metropolis, designed to perpetuate the memories of men, more or less great, or more or less small, the eye rests on no memorial of him who twined his hopes of being remembered in his line with his land's language. Perhaps it is better thus—that neglected by his own, the world may more freely claim as its inheritance a genius so splendid, and, with all his errors, a soul so grand. I feel proud, as an Irishman, of the privilege of placing an humble wreath on the tomb of him who gave to Greece his earliest song and his latest sigh, and whose first speech in the House of Lords was delivered in defence of the expiring liberties of my country. The revival of a Byzantine Empire, with a renewal, I suppose, on the Bosphorus of the exploits of the Heracleidae, may be, and most probably is, a delusive dream; but an enlargement of the European Kingdom of Greece is an aspiration, a purpose of the Hellenic race which must be satisfied before there can be a settlement of the Eastern Question. When, after the battle of Navarino, limits were assigned by European diplomacy to the Kingdom of Greece, Thessaly, and Epirus, at least, and the islands of the Ægean Sea, together with the Ionian Isles, the populations of which, mainly Greek, had shared the hazards and sufferings of the War of Independence, ought, in justice and in sound policy, to have been included as a portion of independent Greece. Had this been done, there would have been no need of an Anglo-French occupation of the Piræus during the Crimean War; no need of a Conference at Paris in 1869, to tie the hands of the Greek Government, and prevent it from openly identifying itself with the cause of the Cretan insurgents; no need of the pressure brought to bear last year at Athens, and the delusive promises made, with a view to repress the disposition of the Greeks to war; no need, perhaps, of the Conference at Constantinople; for, stimulated by the example, and sustained by the sympathy and support of a strong free State, the Slav provinces of European Turkey would, in all human probability, ere this have settled for themselves, and in the only way in which such causes ever can be settled, the relations which should subsist between them and the Ottoman Porte. The same considerations of justice and sound policy which ought to have dictated this course in the year 1828 are as cogent now as they were at that time. Yet I do not maintain that it would be expedient for foreign Powers to originate an attempt to rescue this population from the domination of their oppressors, because nations can seldom enjoy true liberty and independence unless they win these blessings by their own efforts and sacrifices; but at least such efforts and such sacrifices should not be discouraged by the Powers of Europe. Slavery may be imposed on a people—liberty cannot be, she must be won—and as a rule the greatness of the effort made to win her is the measure of the fitness to receive her, the best preparation for her enjoyment, and the surest guarantee of her permanency. The Greeks, at all events, have proved themselves, and doing so have shown that the spirit of nationality, like the spirit of nature, is imperishable, and survives

Temple and monument moulder into dust—silent the oracle; but the cleft mountain and the caverned waterfall are unchanged, and the Fountain of Castalia still sends forth its sparkling rill. The obvious duty of Europe, it seems to me, is simply to second the designs of nature, and help those who show a disposition manfully to help themselves.

There are interests, we are told, which must be protected; but if they be bond fide interests, there ought to be no difficulty in finding a mode of protection without trenching on the rights of oppressed peoples. I grant that until the time shall have arrived for determining who shall be the eventual masters of Constantinople, it is for the interest of Western Europe that the status quo should be maintained on the shores of the Bosphorus. But with a view even to such an eventuality, I ask if a free Bulgaria, and a free Thessaly, Epirus, and Macedonia, would not be of legitimate interests, a surer and more becoming defence, than Turkish forts on the Danube, or fortified passes in the Balkans? The forts and passes may be captured—it is an affair of science, of strength, at the most, of time; but free institutions, upheld by hearts and hands of free-born men, form against lawless adventure an impassable barrier. If—which I do not believe—the first line of defence of the Indian Empire must begin on the Danube or the Balkans, let free institutions span the river and guard the passes. The small States of Belgium and Holland fulfil a most important function in the European system, and I fail to comprehend what interest in the East or in the West would suffer detriment from the establishment of a South-Eastern Belgium and a South-Eastern Holland. The spirit of the age, and the accepted morality of fait accompli, favour the accumulation of large Empires, and save where here and there a little Switzerland, a Portugal, a Denmark, a Belgium, or a Holland gleams like an oasis, the map of Europe is a wilderness of incongruous immensities. Does not a wise statesmanship dictate the policy of omitting no opportunity of helping into life similar small communities? The material is there—it only awaits the artist's hand to mould it into form. From where Danube pours his impetuous flood through the “Iron Gates,” to where the Attic wave beams with its “countless smiles,” from Black Sea to Adriatic, there stretches a fruitful and romantic region, the home of historic races; and I can picture for statesmanship no loftier ambition, for power no prouder prerogative, than to aid the struggles of such countries and such peoples to emerge from the tomb in which for centuries they have lain, and rejoice at last in the dawn of their Easter Sunday. History repeats itself, and now Europe is perplexed by a problem similar to that which 50 years ago exercised its statesmanship and put in motion its arm. Europe has grown older, and become, perhaps, more selfish and less chivalrous; but the cause in issue now is the same as was in issue then, and good reasons, I submit, must be shown to justify a departure from the policy prescribed by the genius of Mr. Canning and of Lord Palmerston. I decline to believe that the Republic of Mac Mahon is less disposed to sympathize with and to aid noble causes, than was the Monarchy of the Bourbons. Napoleon the Third, on sending the expeditionary force to Syria, said—

And surely a still glorious flag never shed its halo round a cause more sacred than that of a people struggling to be free. The form of government, whether it be despotic, or aristocratic, or democratic, or mixed, which may prevail in any country, is a matter of secondary consideration. The one thing needful is that she be independent. Wanting that, she is nothing—a mere geographical definition, covering a certain space on the world's chart, but unknown and unreckoned in the sphere of humanity. Russia to many is a name of terror. I am no Russo-phile. Were I a Circassian, I would have been a follower of Schamyl; were I a Pole, I would have been found in the ranks of the scythe-armed men; but when Russia is in the right, as by the admission of Europe she now is, she is entitled to the sympathy, the respect, and the support of Europe. In championing the cause of the oppressed in the Turkish Provinces, she may be actuated to some extent by selfish motives—what nation is not so actuated at times?—but to those who attribute to her sinister motives I would say, look to Berlin, where perchance you may find the commodity, and be spared the journey to St. Petersburg. The same motives, no doubt, actuate Russia now as in 1829, but we saw her pause then in her career of victory to give freedom to a nation. The same influences which induced her then to dictate peace at Adrianople would be equally efficacious, I should think, now to induce her to pause again in a career of conquest, and dictate another peace, wider still in its scope, and destined, it may reasonably be presumed, to prove more beneficent still in its operation. I take for granted that the Treaty of 1856 can never more be appealed to—that it is no longer law in Europe. Every Power, the Porte included, has recovered its freedom of action—so, too, have the nationalities, the Slavs and the Greeks, and they now, not the Powers, are masters of the situation. If they choose to accept the reforms of Midhat Pasha, and furl the flag of independence, no Power will be called on to intervene—it is their affair. If, however, as is most probable, rejecting the reforms and the constitutions, they resolve to renew the strife and fight on, not for the irreducible minimum, not for a foreign Committee, so truly described by the noble Earl, the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, as the worst Government any country could have, but for political autonomy pure and simple, then intervention becomes a necessity, imposed by duty, and sanctioned by right. Why should the work of pacification, for such in its true sense it is, be cast upon Russia alone? Why should the destinies of an important portion of Europe, and of millions of people, be left to the disposal of three Emperors? What Power is there that, having commissioned a Plenipotentiary to Constantinople, and having expended a Black Sea of philanthropic ink in denunciation of Bulgarian atrocities, so blinded by egotism as to imagine, for a moment, it can fold its arms and remain benevolently neutral, while another Power sheds her blood for objects about which it could only scribble and declaim? This country, though, offered a powerful alliance, stood benevolently neutral while the last struggle of the Poles was being terribly suppressed; benevolently neutral while the Duchies were wrested from Denmark; benevolently neutral while Alsace-Lorraine was torn from France—and, I trust I may be pardoned the expression of a hope, that, should a similar ignominious policy now prevail, she may be debarred from appearing even as a gleaner on the harvest-field of the Danube. What though the triumph of the Slav liberty on the Balkans should open to Russian vessels of war the Straits of the Bosphorus and the

Mr. P. J. Smyth

Dardanelles? On what ground of justice, or even expediency, can the existing prohibition be defended? The argument of the right hon. Gentleman, the Member for Birmingham, is irrefutable. These Straits are not to be compared to rivers which have their sources in Turkish territory—they are natural highways, connecting sea with sea—but the prohibition operates as a blockade of a wide sea, fed by great rivers having their sources in Russian territory, and on the shores of which that Power predominates. The Treaty imposed by Cimon of Athens on Artaxerxes contained, it is said, a similar prohibition—that no Persian vessel of war should navigate between the Black Sea and the coast of Pamphylia; but that was before the era of free trade, and at the close of a series of wars which shed imperishable lustre on the Grecian arms. Russia has never sustained any such reverses at the hands of any Power, or of any combination of Powers. I never could discover what danger the West has to apprehend from Russia. Her destiny impels her eastward, and there her mission must necessarily be one of civilization. But this question is not, and, unless through sheer mismanagement, never can become, one of territorial aggrandizement. The principles which control it, co-extensive with the human race, and immortal as the soul, lift it high above the sphere, and will preserve it from the contamination, of vulgar ambition. We hear much of Turkish armaments, the concentration of troops in Bulgaria, and a powerful fleet under the command of an English admiral in the Sea of Marmora; but, if a genuine sentiment of nationality animate the hearts of Slavs and Greeks, if the passion for independence, like the old Greek fire, has kept on burning beneath the waters of persecution, armaments and fleets will perish, as perished the hosts of Sennacherib before the hand of the destroying angel, and the down-trodden of centuries shall resume their place of honour yet in Israel.

MR. CHAPLIN said, he did not rise to answer the eloquent speech of the hon. Gentleman who had just sat down, or to enter at length on the Eastern Question, believing that other and more convenient opportunities would be afforded for its full discussion. He agreed in every word which had fallen from his right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for War. The position assigned to Turkey by the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Gladstone) with regard to the Treaties appeared to afford a remarkable illustration of the old saying—“Heads, I win; tails, you lose.” His object in rising was to make some inquiries, in order, if possible, to make that line of demarcation more distinct which the hon. Member had just referred to, and to ask one or two questions of the right hon. Member for Greenwich, from whom the House was entitled to demand some explanation. He trusted the right hon. Gentleman opposite would be able to give a distinct and definite answer. He could not complain of this course. He had taken an exceedingly active part in the discussion which had arisen during the Recess in regard to this question—as many people thought an exceedingly mischievous part, and not by any means calculated to assist, but to retard any wise and happy solution of this momentous question. He need not remind the House of the course which the right hon. Gentleman had thought proper to take. They could not forget the deliberate and persistent attempts which had been made throughout the Recess—not by the Liberal Party or the noble Lord (the Marquess of Hartington) opposite—to their credit be it spoken—but by a certain portion and clique of that Party, headed by the right hon. Gentleman, to regulate the foreign policy of this country by pamphlets, by speeches at public meetings, and by a so-called national Conference, instead of leaving it in the hands of the Executive Government, who alone could possibly possess the requisite information which enabled them to deal with the question. That was a mode of proceeding obviously open to very great objection. It must be attended with great inconvenience to all parties concerned. He was not prepared to say that the policy of every Government under all circumstances, and at any time, must be accepted as a matter of course, without cavil or dispute by its opponents or by the country; but he did say this, that such a course as that pursued by the right hon. Gentleman must entail on those who adopted it the most immense responsibility. It was a course which nothing could justify, but circumstances of the most supreme necessity. [Cheers and counter cheers. Whether that justification or that necessity existed in the case—as he gathered from the cheers he heard—was a matter on which there would be very considerable difference of opinion; but it was clear that the right hon. Gentleman accepted the position and all the responsibility which it entailed. [Mr. GLADSTONE: Hear, hear!] More than that, he had told them distinctly, while admitting the full responsibility and the immense weight of censure he would justly incur in the absence of full justification for the course he had taken—he had told them in what he considered his justification was to be found. He said at the Conference held in St. James's Hall on the 9th of December—and that was his excuse for attending the meeting and taking part in the agitation—he said—

“We believe that the power, the influence, and the reputation of England for a long period of time with regard to this enormous question have been used for a purpose and to an effect directly at variance with the convictions of the people of this country.”

[Mr. GLADSTONE: Hear, hear!] He was quoting the words of the right hon. Gentleman, and that was the sum and substance of the indictment against Her Majesty's Government contained in the whole of his speeches, and a graver or a more serious charge to bring against any existing Administration it would not be easy to imagine. Now, if the right hon. Gentleman was correct in his views as to the policy of Her Majesty's Government at the time, or if he was infallible in his judgment of the feelings of the people of England, then there would be much to be said for the course which he had pursued. But they knew that the right hon. Gentleman, far from being infallible, was often extremely mistaken as to his views of the people. From the last General Election and from various other sources he could show, if it were needful to do so, that the right hon. Gentleman had been mistaken before, as assuredly he had been mistaken in this case. Nor was that much to be wondered at, if they considered the sources from which the right hon. Gentleman sought his information. Where did the right hon. Gentleman look for it in this case in particular? Not in that House from the legitimate and direct Representatives of the public opinion. No: it had been from very different sources, which he (Mr. Chaplin) would tell to the House. It was from public meetings, for the most part arranged and prepared for his reception by local Party organizations; from the cheers of the populace brought together by Liberal clubs at various railway stations, where the right hon. Gentleman, of course, chanced to be passing; and last, not least, from the so-called “National Conference” in St. James's Hall, which, as far as he could discover, was little else than a packed meeting of the right hon. Gentleman's supporters, to which each of them was admitted by ticket. He would say, without scruple or hesitation, from his place in that House, that, so far as its national character and national name were concerned, a more barefaced, audacious sham and imposture could not be imagined. Those were the sources to which the right hon. Gentleman looked for his information. Now, there were many on that side who were and had been warm and consistent supporters of the policy of Her Majesty's Government, and who therefore, being probably regarded by the right hon. Gentleman as accomplices in their misconduct, were placed in this totally false and unfair position—that while they had been the victims so long of all the charges and accusations of the right hon. Gentleman's torrents of eloquence, there seemed to be no disposition on his part, now that he was brought face to face at last with those whom he had so long greatly maligned, to test the opinion of Parliament as between him and them, or give them the benefit of an appeal to that tribunal from which alone we could hope to learn the true, real, and deliberate voice of the people of England. The speeches and writings with which the right hon. Gentleman had flooded the country bore this construction, that the misconduct of the supporters of the Government lay chiefly in this—that while the right hon. Gentleman would be prepared to go to war for the coercion of Turkey, they were not prepared to adopt so extreme and violent a course. In these circumstances he wished to ask the right hon. Gentleman these questions—Did he intend by a definite Motion to test the truth and the justice of his accusations, and to take the opinion of Parliament on the misconduct with which he charged Her Majesty's Government? Did the right hon. Gentleman mean to meet or to evade that obligation? One of two things, the right hon. Gentleman must do. He must make good or withdraw his assertions, that was clearly a duty from which he could not escape; for he (Mr. Chaplin) held, without a shadow of doubt, that when a Member of Parliament in a position so eminent as the Member for Greenwich traversed the country from north to south, and from east to west, levelling charges and accusations broadcast against his opponents, especially at times when he knew they could not be there to repel them. There was no other course which it was open to a man of honour to follow. ["Order."]

COLONEL MURE: I rise to Order. A personal attack of this kind is most offensive.

MR. GLADSTONE: I wish to put to you, Sir, whether it is competent for the hon. Member to instruct me as to the only course which it is open for me as a man of honour to follow?

MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Gentleman in making use of that expression has exceeded the limits of Parliamentary discussion.

MR. CHAPLIN said, he withdrew, of course, any expression he might have used which was not in accordance with Parliamentary custom, and begged to offer an apology to the right hon. Gentleman. Then he would say there was no other course which, in his humble opinion, it was the right hon. Gentleman's duty to follow. Secondly, he wished to ask the right hon. Gentleman, when he appealed in the passionate terms which he did in his last speech at Taunton to the people of England, to grapple with the great duty which they had to perform, and to emulate by their own deeds the glorious deeds of their forefathers, to tell them what was the great duty which he meant them to undertake, and the means by which he considered it could be performed? The Conference had just then come to an end, and he (Mr. Chaplin) understood it to mean that they should coerce Turkey in order to make her accept those proposals. Turkey, it was perfectly clear, would not now be coerced without war. Whether Turkey, at one time, might not have listened to England if it had not been for the suspicions of England engendered by the right hon. Gentleman and his unsparing onslaughts upon her, was a matter which was open to room for some doubt. These were the questions which he wished to ask the right hon. Gentleman, and to which he was bound to give a definite and distinct answer. The right hon. Gentleman in one of his speeches claimed the position of an independent Member of Parliament. He (Mr. Chaplin) also claimed the same position, and, speaking from his place on that side as an independent Member, he would tell the right hon. Gentleman he could not now shelter himself under that plea. If there was one thing made clearer than another during the Recess it was this—that the Leadership of the Opposition in the country had been entirely dissociated from the Leadership of the Opposition in that House; and having accepted that position in the country the right hon. Gentleman could not escape the obligations or the legitimate consequences which it involved in that House. Upon every ground of decency and justice it was his duty to test the opinion of Parliament as to the conduct of the Government. It was true by the Forms of the House the right hon. Gentleman could not meet that challenge to-night; but if the House wished it, he believed it was perfectly competent for him to provide the right hon. Gentleman with that opportunity by concluding with a Motion. But first let him say that above and before any mere question of the position in which hon. Gentlemen on that side of the House were placed by his very unusual course, there was one point yet to consider which the right hon. Gentleman would himself admit was of surpassing importance. The peace of the Continent at this very moment was wavering in the balance. Peace or war at this moment depended on the action of Russia, and the action of Russia he firmly believed, depended and waited on the public opinion of England. The right hon. Gentleman had been the first to rouse that opinion elsewhere. He challenged the right hon. Gentleman here in his place in the House to invite the expression of the opinion of the Imperial Parliament—the only source from which they could ever measure the depth and the strength of the national voice. God forbid that that voice should be for war; if it were, the immediate action of Russia was certain, and he feared to think where such a policy might end. But if on the spot Parliament distinctly rejected such a bad and monstrous proposal, he would hope against hope that peace might even yet be secured. Then England would have much cause to rejoice that her councils were no longer swayed by one whose voice during the Recess had done so much to impair that respect and esteem which they on all sides felt for him in that House, and to shake to its foundation the great and splendid reputation of a man whom England had long learnt to regard, and as he and all admitted him to be, among the greatest of her sons. He begged to move the Adjournment of the Debate.

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, I rise to second the Motion for the Adjournment. For the first time in the course of a public life, approaching nearly half a century, I have been accused by the hon. Gentleman who has just spoken of a disinclination to meet my opponents in fair fight. "He cannot," the hon. Gentleman modestly says of me, "meet us face to face." He further tells us he learns the opinion of the country from public meetings. Why, I ask, did not the hon. Gentleman come to those public meetings? He says that I have been east and west, that I have been north and south. If that be true, there has been plenty of opportunity for him and his friends to attend those meetings. Then the hon. Gentleman says that the Conference in St. James's Hall was a packed meeting; and it was a packed meeting, in the sense in which I believe every meeting held by a Conservative Club and a Conservative Association is a packed meeting. [Lord GEORGE HAMILTON: National, national!] I will deal with the noble Lord next, if he likes to make another attack without making these interlocutory speeches. Meanwhile, let me say that if the hon. Gentleman, to whose speech I was adverting, had had a hundredth part of the experience I have had of the feelings of the people of this country, so far from charging me to-night with having gone east and west and north and south for the purpose of inciting public meetings, he would have known what every man acquainted with me knows—he would have known what every person whom I have visited, Tory as well as Liberal, is perfectly acquainted with—that I have on every occasion shrunk from meeting the public. ["Oh!"] Yes, Sir, I repeat it, and I will supply the hon. Gentleman, if he likes, with the names of those Tory gentlemen to whom he may appeal in confirmation of my statement. But such is the depth and strength of the sentiment that has taken possession of the mind and heart of England in reference to this question, that I, in my poor and feeble person, simply because I have been associated with that sentiment, have felt it almost impossible to avoid the manifestation of this almost unexampled national and popular feeling. As to the St. James's Hall Conference, not only in point of form, but of substance, it was entitled to the name of a National Conference; because it aimed at expressing—and believed it was expressing—the sentiments of the nation—[Lord GEORGE HAMILTON: That is a mistake.]—just as in former times—I think about the time when the noble Lord was born—there was what was called a National Anti-Corn Law League, which was derided on the same ground as the noble Lord, with his mature experience, derides the St. James's Hall Conference.

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON: Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of Order. The right hon. Gentleman says I derided the national sentiment. I beg to say that I did nothing of the sort.

MR. GLADSTONE: The noble Lord has risen to Order, but I think he is very disorderly. Nor did I say that he derided the national sentiment, but that he derided the assumption of the title of "National" by the Conference at St. James's Hall; and I said that whatever the propriety of that title might be in point of form, it reminded me of another title assumed by another private association—the National Anti-Corn Law League—which was equally derided about the time of the birth of the noble Lord. But it proved its nationality, first by overcoming the obstinate resistance of the Party to which the noble Lord belongs. That Party existed—a fact which he does not seem to know—before he was born. If he thinks it came into existence with himself, I assure him it is a mistake. And that League proved its nationality, secondly, by this—that it came to express the universal sentiment of the nation, so that now no man ventures to lift up his voice and say, "I am a vindicator and an apologist of the Corn Laws." This is an answer to the noble Lord who interrupted me. The hon. Gentleman has put to me some questions, under circumstances which, I suppose, he thought most convenient, upon a subject relating to the rather dry matter of the interpretation of Treaties, on which I endeavoured to confine myself in the strictest manner to the terms of my Notice. The hon. Gentleman, as he said, did not propose to follow the eloquent speech of the hon. Member who preceded him—a task which he might have found rather difficult, but he produced instead his prepared interrogatories, and the well-arranged sentences by which they were wound into a series. That is a specimen, forsooth, of the courage with which the "Knight of the Shire" instructs me, after my long service in this House, as to my duty in public life, and reproaches me with unwillingness to meet a champion equal to himself. He says, Sir, that I have been an inflammatory agitator, and that as soon as I have got into this House I have shown no disposition to chant in the same key. But before these debates are over—before this question is settled—the hon. Gentleman will know more about my opinions than he knows at present, or is likely to know to-night. I am not about to reveal now to the hon. Gentleman even the insignificant secrets of a mind so inferior to his own. I am not so young as to think that his obliging inquiries supply me with the opportunity most advantageous to the public interest for laying out the plan of a campaign. By the time the hon. Member is as old as I am, if he comes in his turn to be accused of cowardice by a man of the generation next to himself, he probably may find it convenient to refer to the reply I am now making, and to make it a model, or, at all events, to take from it hints and suggestions with which to dispose of the antagonist that may then rise against him. The hon. Gentleman says there is a tremendous feeling abroad in the country—tremendous it is, not in its violence, but in its depth of force, and, thank God, that it is abroad; and the hon. Gentleman says it was I who was the first to arouse it by pamphlets and by speeches. It is unquestionable that I published a pamphlet on the 5th or 6th of September of last year, and it is equally unquestionable that I made a speech to my constituents on, I think, the 9th of the same month; and it seems from the speech of the hon. Gentleman that owing to this pamphlet and speech the policy of Her Majesty's Government has been terribly disturbed. The whole country, we are told, has been disturbed from end to end; and peace has been prevented from settling down upon Europe. I really feel such a temptation to accept the gigantic and exaggerated compliments of the hon. Gentleman; the incense which he offers upon my altar, so to call it, is so fragrant and rises in such a steam to Heaven, that I am almost sorry to be called upon to enter into conflict with the hon. Gentleman. But, Sir, I cannot, notwithstanding the force of this temptation, forget my allegiance to truth; and if I am told that by the pamphlet I wrote and the speech I delivered I have done all this mischief and agitated Europe and the world, let me ask why the hon. Gentleman did not, by writing another pamphlet and delivering another speech, put the whole thing right? Am I the only man to whom it is permitted by law to write a pamphlet, or to whom is given the permission, according to Constitutional practice, to address his constituents? It was the public arena of discussion into which I descended, most reluctantly and very late, but with the deep and full conviction—with regard to which the hon. Gentleman has not in the least overstated my case—that the responsibility was great, that it was impossible, in my opinion, to justify questioning the course of the Government on a matter of most important national policy in the Department of Foreign Affairs, unless upon a plea as broad as that which I advanced—namely, that in my deep and firm conviction they had unintentionally misrepresented the sentiment of the country, and were using its power and influence for purposes which were in direct antagonism to the best and deepest wishes of its heart. That is the justification on which I stood and stand. But the hon. Gentleman says I did it, and I heard another hon. Gentleman say to-night that I did it. Really, to a certain extent, it administers an agreeable irritation to whatever vanity one may possess to hear such immense results attributed to so trifling forces. But if anything was done by me, it was done in the same way that a man applies a match to an enormous mass of fuel which has been already prepared; and the indication of a point towards which the public sentiment should be directed was all that could possibly be required. My hon. Friend the Member for the Isle of Wight (Mr. B. Cochrane) in the early part of his speech said that I had done all this, but a little later he seemed to have forgot what he had said, and ascribed the whole of what he had previously attributed to me to Lord Shaftesbury, in the course of a speech which he delivered in St. James's Hall. I therefore feel the greatest satisfaction in making over to Lord Shaftesbury the palm and the prize. I rejoice that he was my leader, and that I was his follower in a cause so noble and so good. But we have some other evidence before us. This dreadful pamphlet of mine—which, it seems, nobody thought fit to answer, and by answering to paralyze—was published on the 5th or 6th of September. Aye, but what was said on the 22nd of August? The literature of the hon. Member, with all the time he has taken, and all the careful preparation of his speech in every sentence, has not been able to get deep into the confidence of the massive Blue Books. On that day Lord Derby telegraphed, in effect, to Sir Henry Elliot that—

“Any sympathy which was previously felt in England towards Turkey has been completely destroyed by the recent lamentable occurrences in Bulgaria. The accounts of outrages and excesses committed by the Turkish troops”—notably Bashi-Bazouks—“upon an unhappy, and for the most part unresisting population, has roused an universal feeling of indignation in all classes of English society, and to such a pitch has this risen that in the extreme case of Russia declaring war against Turkey, Her Majesty's Government would find it practically impossible to interfere in defence of the Ottoman Empire.”

This was written a fortnight before my poor pamphlet was published and 10 days before it was even announced. Therefore, it is that, flattered as I am by the attack of the hon. Gentleman, and tempted as I am to appropriate what I regard, coming from him, as praises, I must, in deference to truth, point out that I was simply an humble collaborateur with the English people in a work which they had taken into their own hands. In a matter of humanity and justice they required no instructor. It was the nation that led the classes and the leaders, and not the classes and leaders who led the nation. Let me ask what are the questions of the hon. Gentleman? He asks whether I will test the opinion of this House? I have a great respect for the opinion of this House; but does he want me to test the opinion of a traditional House of Commons, or of the particular one in which he happens to sit? I have had the felicity of sitting with the hon. Gentleman in other Houses of Commons; but I do not recollect that he had in those earlier days the same respect he now professes for the opinion of the House, or that he regarded them as the infallible indicators of public opinion, that he seems to think this House must unquestionably be. I will tell the hon. Gentleman something in answer to his questions, and it is that I will tell him nothing at all. I will take my own counsel, and beg to inform him that he should have no reason whatever to complain when the accounts come to be settled and cast up at the end of the whole matter of any reticence or suppressions on my part. He asks, further, what it was that I recommended to the people of Taunton? On that question I will tell him a little more than I did on the first. As a rule, the hon. Gentleman keeps the best of his arguments and of his eloquence for this House, but I have been reading him in a local newspaper, and have been able by that means only to follow him into his own county; for though I have travelled east, west, north, and south, I have not been so happy as in my own person to reach that part of England. But I see he adapted himself to what he considers apparently the meridian of a local audience. He told them I had appeared at Taunton, and that I found by accident that I had an hour an a-half to dispose of, and that, having an hour and a-half to dispose of, I went out upon the stage and addressed such of the people of Taunton as happened to be present, upon the merits of the Eastern Question and most important topics of International Law. The hon. Gentleman has fallen into the most ludicrous of mistakes. He is not aware that there are in this country most useful publications under the denomination of railway time-tables, and that if a man will look into these railway time-tables he can see for several days, or for a whole month, beforehand, when his

trains will arrive and when they will depart. That is a very useful piece of information, and I hope he will not forget it. By the diligent use of these railway time-tables I was enabled several days beforehand to calculate my movements through Taunton with the same precision with which our astronomers calculates the coming comet or eclipse. Therefore, my arrangements, instead of having the romantic air of novelty with which the hon. Member sought to invest them, not in this House, but in another meridian, were really stereotyped affairs, settled beforehand in the dullest and most prosaic manner, though they seem to have effectually puzzled the mind of the hon. Member. If he wants to know what I recommended to the people of Taunton, I have a mind to tell him that if he will ask the people of Taunton, they will tell him that they understood me very well. I understand that my hon. Friends who represent Taunton have found that I was perfectly well understood. But, in brief, what I told the people of Taunton was this—that, in my opinion, it was absolutely necessary for them to watch the policy of the Government; that in the acts, in the language, and in the tendency of Lord Salisbury I had great confidence; but that I did not know whether the Government has one policy or two policies. This I know—that all the newspapers that are in their confidence every now and then take the opportunity of letting fly at Lord Salisbury. This I know, that when I read the Blue Books—over which I suspect the hon. Gentleman has not spent half as many minutes as I have hours—I find in one page the arguments of Lord Salisbury for a proposition, and in another page those of Sir Henry Elliot against it. This is a state of things which impressed me with the belief that it was time yet and time still for the people of Taunton to be upon their guard; and, therefore, as far as my powers of exposition did go, I did endeavour to lay before them that the people of England had still a very great work to do. We have, I think, the most solemn and the greatest question to determine that has come before Parliament in my time. It is only under very rare circumstances that such a question—the question of the East—can be fully raised, fully developed, and exhibited, and fully brought home to the minds of men with that force, with that command, with that absorbing power which it ought to exercise over them. In the original entrance of the Turks into Europe, it may be said to have been a turning point in human history. To a great extent it continues to be the cardinal question, the question which casts into the shade every other question, and the question which is now brought before the mind of the country far more fully than at any period of our history, far more fully than even at the time of the Crimean War, when we were pouring forth our blood and treasure in what we thought to be the cause of justice and right. And I endeavoured to impress upon the minds of that audience, not a blind prejudice against this man or that, but a great watchfulness, and the duty of great activity. It is the duty of every man to feel that he is bound for himself, according to his opportunities, to examine what belongs to this question, with regard to which it can never be forgotten that we are those who set up the power of Turkey in 1854; that we are those who gave her the strength which has been exhibited in the Bulgarian massacres; that we are those who made the Treaty arrangements that have secured her for 20 years from almost a single hour of uneasiness brought about by foreign intervention; and that, therefore, nothing can be greater and nothing deeper than our responsibility in the matter. It is incumbent upon us, one and all, that we do not allow any consideration, either of Party or personal convenience, to prevent us from endeavouring to the best of our ability to discharge this great duty that now, at length, in the East, in the midst of this great opportunity, when all Europe has been called to collective action, and when something like European concert has been established—when we learn the deep human interests that are involved in every stage of the question, that, as far as England at least, is concerned, every Englishman should strive to the utmost of his might that justice shall be done.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
 —(Mr. Chaplin.)

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I cannot wonder, Mr. Speaker, at the cheers with which the eloquent language of the right hon. Gentleman has been greeted, and I cannot but echo the concluding words of his speech; but I do venture to come before the House and to remind them what our position is. Nothing can be graver than the position which we occupy. In the eyes of this country and in the eyes of Europe this House occupies a position which may make every one of us pause and think well over every word we say and every step we take. In the midst of the anxious expectation of the people of England, and perhaps of many more people, as to what course was likely to be taken by the House of Commons in particular upon this question which is now occupying our attention—at this critical moment of negotiation, when the question of peace and war is hanging in the balance, and the voice of England may decide the destinies of nations for years and years to come—my right hon. Friend chooses to invite the House of Commons to hear him put a solemn question to the Government. He takes steps for obtaining the best possible means of putting that question, and of making the statement with which he proposed to accompany it. Attention is excited, the House is full, every one is awaiting what he has to say. My right hon. Friend comes forward and puts in language which he himself has described, and truly described, as language of a most moderate and temperate kind, the questions which he wishes to put. He puts them accompanied by explanations which are intended partly, no doubt, to explain the question, but much more, as it seems to me, intended to offer apologies for the conduct of his own previous Colleagues and himself upon critical occasions. He comes forward to tell us how he and those with whom he has been associated have formerly acted on the matter to which they now draw so much attention. He comes forward to tell us what they meant when they made the Treaty of 1856, and still more what they meant when they renewed it in 1871. He called attention to a particular despatch of my noble Friend the Secretary of State, and he asks us questions with regard to the meaning of certain expressions in that despatch. He was answered, and he was answered I think satisfactorily. He was answered, and I think answered conclusively. He was answered frankly and fully by my right hon.

Friend the Secretary of State for War. What was the object which my right hon. Friend had in putting those questions? I suppose it was not merely for the purpose of casting some taunt, if he thought he could do so, against Her Majesty's Government. I suppose it was not for the mere purpose of justifying himself and his Colleagues with regard to past transactions. No, Sir, I attribute to him a higher motive than that. I believe he wished to ascertain fully and clearly what the views of Her Majesty's Government were with regard to some of the most important questions which we have to consider at the present day, in order that he might elicit at some proper opportunity the sense of Parliament upon the conduct of Her Majesty's Government and upon the views which they entertain upon this subject. There has been an interesting, though a rather irregular, debate. A large number of topics have been introduced which went beyond the scope of my right hon. Friend's question, but which it is not surprising that Gentlemen who had come to the House expecting the whole Eastern Question raised should be anxious to give utterance to. But as matters went on, towards the end of the evening a natural anxiety began to manifest itself on this side of the House to know what all this meant. A natural impatience was felt at the moment by my hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Lincolnshire (Mr. Chaplin) to know what is the course which my right hon. Friend the Member for Greenwich, and those Members who agree with him on this subject, intend to ask Parliament to adopt; or can it indeed be true that they do not intend to ask Parliament to take any course at all? As we get on in the course of the evening we become excited by the eloquent language that we hear on different sides of the House, and unhappily we may get into a frame of mind in which expressions are sometimes used which had better not be used. Expressions are used in the heat of debate which those who use them are afterwards prepared to withdraw when they are found to give offence and pain. I think that whatever may be said upon that point the House is anxious, and properly anxious, to know whether it is or is not to be consulted on this matter. My right hon. Friend, in answer to my hon. Friend the Member for

Mid-Lincolnshire, referred to the precedent of the National Anti-Corn Law League with regard to the conduct of this matter. Every one knows what the National Anti-Corn Law League was and is, that although it operated at private meetings and by various other ways in its endeavours to arouse and instruct the popular mind upon the question of free trade, yet it took very good care to come before the House of Commons small as the minority at first was in favour of free trade. It did not keep its arguments for free trade halls or public meetings. Members of that Association came forward like men and like statesmen, and argued the question in the House of Commons, and by degrees and by force of arguments in and out of this House. Those results of which we are cognizant were produced. I want to know whether for those who have taken the leading part which some Gentlemen opposite have taken in the discussions on this question in the country during the autumn there is any excuse for not coming forward to propose a censure of the conduct of the Government on the Eastern Question. [Mr. GLADSTONE: There is plenty of time yet.] We do not want to press you—choose as early a day as may be convenient; but if you desire time it appears to me to be rather a questionable policy to employ the present time in starting a flight of questions on this or on the other point, with no apparent object but either to insinuate something which may be odious, or for the purpose of laying a trap to catch a different meaning in the answer to something in the Blue Books. That is not the way to deal with subjects of this magnitude. You are bound, if you respect your own consistency—if you have a regard to credit and honour and the interests of the nation—you are bound, I say, to do one of two things—either to challenge the conduct of the Government when they have an opportunity of answering the charges you bring against them; or you may say—“We made our charges in ignorance of the policy you pursued; we made them under a false impression; and we have therefore no intention to challenge your conduct.” Will you say that? One or other of those things you ought to do. My hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Lincolnshire has given expression to that opinion in language more energetic, perhaps, than polite, but it does not diminish the truth and force of the opinion which he has given. My right hon. Friend opposite implies that he has doubts about the advantage of bringing this question before the House, which he does not think will give him a majority, and he finds that for some reason or other that would be a waste of his powers. But surely this House has as much right to be taken into the confidence of the right hon. Gentleman as have the people of Taunton. There are, says the right hon. Gentleman, time-tables which tell the time at which trains arrive at Taunton station. We also in this House have a time-table, in the shape of our Notice Papers, and we shall be only too glad should my right hon. Friend avail himself of one of the opportunities which that time-table will afford him if he will take us into his confidence and tell us in what respect he thinks the conduct of the Government needs watching. He does himself injustice if he would have us believe that with his quick perception he has not mastered his case and made himself sufficiently acquainted with the Blue Books to be able to show us the general rule which he thinks it is his duty to follow. He says that the Blue Books indicates a difference of opinion between one person and another person who is responsible for these negotiations, and he told us, as he told the people of Taunton, that he desires that the conduct of Her Majesty's Government shall be scrutinized and jealously scrutinized. Sir, we do not for a moment object to the most jealous scrutiny of our conduct. We demand that jealous scrutiny. We demand it not only as a matter of justice to ourselves, but, what is of much more importance, in the interest of the country, and even in the interest of Europe. It is of the highest consequence that this country should speak with no doubtful voice. We have heard of two Russias—we have heard of two Austrias—but we do not want two Englands; and I do not believe there are two Englands. I do not say we may not have some persons who take peculiar views and who are disposed to lay greater stress on one set of considerations than on another; but I believe, if we could bring this matter to a fair issue—if we could get out of the region of innuendoes and taunts of every kind; if, instead of mere critical and negative arguments, objecting to this thing, objecting to that, and questioning the other, you would bring forward a statement of the policy which you think we ought to pursue; if you would give us your reasons for preferring this policy to that which you believe we are pursuing, and give us an opportunity of arguing this matter out, it would be most satisfactory to us and I believe most beneficial to the national interests. I do regret, in one sense, that this evening, which began like a lamb, should be going out in a much more tempestuous manner. But it could hardly be expected that some warmth would not be elicited in the course of our discussions. I think it would now be too late and too much at variance with the feeling and temper of the House to enter into anything like an elaborate discussion or criticism of the arguments which have been brought forward to-night, especially as we have no issue before us. I would not say that a reconnaissance en force such as this may not have in some respects its advantages if it be meant as a prelude to a more serious and regular engagement. If hon. Gentlemen have been endeavouring, as some suppose, by putting these questions and raising this discussion to see—as the common phrase is—“how the cat jumps” they will have observed what is the spirit which animates Members on both sides and have had something instructive. But I hope and trust we shall not allow this discussion to degenerate into a mere squabble of a personal or Party character; nor, on the other hand, allow it to close without this practical result—that we shall understand from those who are in the responsible position of Her Majesty’s Opposition, and of my right hon. Friend who has taken so leading a part, whether they have or have not any serious intention of bringing this matter under the notice of Parliament. If they agree to do so, I can assure them we shall give them every assistance we possibly can in arriving at a conclusion.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: I rise, Sir, only to say a very few words with regard to the Question which is actually before the House, as to which it is somewhat strange that the right hon. Gentleman the Leader of this House, who ought, one would suppose, to have some knowledge of its Rules and Orders, should have spoken a considerable time without saying one single word. The Question before the House is the adjournment of this debate, and I am rather inclined to think, after the somewhat stormy conclusion of the debate this evening, that it would be desirable that the Motion of the hon. Member for Mid-Lincolnshire should be agreed to, and that the discussion should be resumed when a more calm consideration can be given to the important questions which my right hon. Friend the Member for Greenwich has raised. The right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer, after a very long preamble, put to hon. Gentlemen who sit on this side of the House the question—“What does all this tend to?” And he seemed to find it to be impossible to conceive that the questions and inquiries which have been addressed to the Government by my right hon. Friend the Member for Greenwich could have any object unless they were intended as a foundation for future proceedings in this House. The answer to the right hon. Gentleman is very plain and simple. All this tends to what it purports to tend to, and to nothing else. My right hon. Friend has called attention to a despatch written by Lord Derby in September, which I think the House will admit contained some very grave statements and gave cause for grave reflection. Lord Derby said that a state of things might arise at any moment which would place this country in an inconvenient and perhaps a humiliating position. What we want to know is, has that state of things continued since and does it exist now? because the state of things upon which Lord Derby formed that opinion has existed, as far as we know, from that day to this. If, in the opinion of Her Majesty’s Government, now, as then, our Treaty engagements bind us to support Turkey by force of arms, and if now, as then, the feeling of the country makes it impossible for the Government to act up to our Treaty engagements, why then we have been since that date, and we are still, standing now on the very verge of that position which has been described by Lord Derby as an inconvenient and a humiliating position. Will the right hon. Gentleman tell us that a question designed to obtain from Her Majesty’s Government assurances, whether we have stood and whether we still stand upon the verge of a humiliating position, is a question which ought not to be put in this House except, forsooth, it is intended to lay foundation for a future Parliamentary attack? The right hon. Gentleman tells us charges have been made against Her Majesty's Government, and that we are bound to go further, and either to repeat and renew them or else to acknowledge that they were made under a false impression. I think it quite possible that Her Majesty's Government may yet have an opportunity of entering upon a full defence of their policy. But, at all events, I am not prepared to admit that those charges were made under a false impression of the policy of Her Majesty's Government. If we should refrain from challenging the policy of the Government now it is not because we admit that at a former time we were under a false impression as to the policy of Her Majesty's Government, but because the policy of Her Majesty's Government now is not the same as their policy was then. What did we know in August, September, October, and up to November of the policy of the Government except what we gathered from such speeches as were delivered by Members of the Government? What we say now is that the policy developed in the Blue Books, especially in the later ones, is not the policy—has no resemblance to the policy—which was developed in those speeches; and if we refrain, as we may or may not do, from challenging the policy of the Government, it is because they have listened to the voice of the people as expressed in those meetings on which so much contumely has been passed. If we do challenge the policy of the Government it is not because we think they are persevering in the Aylesbury and Guildhall policy, but because we still have some doubts remaining in our minds as to whether, if they have changed their policy, they have changed it frankly and fully. The right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer said he thought the inquiries of my right hon. Friend (Mr. Gladstone) had been fully and satisfactorily answered by the Secretary of State for War. I must admit I did not think the right hon. Gentleman expressed himself with all the clearness and precision which we are accustomed to from him; and I think there are many Members on this side of the House—some to my own knowledge —who have some observations to offer on his speech. Looking to the turn which the debate has taken during the last hour, it is impossible it can be resumed to-night with that calmness which its importance demands. I think the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer will best consult the convenience of the House by allowing the debate to be adjourned.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY pointed out that it would be inconvenient to adjourn the debate on the Motion for Supply, which was the only Motion before the House. A much better course, in his opinion, would be to put down the subject on the Paper if it was thought desirable to discuss it further, so that the House might know what they had to deal with.

MR. SANDFORD said, he wanted to know whether there would be any objection to having this debate put down on nights of Supply?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, the question was, whether the House was to continue the discussion or not. The hon. Member for Mid-Lincolnshire (Mr. Chaplin) had exploded a torpedo to-night. They had come to discuss solemnly and seriously the question of what were the Treaty obligations of England. It was really preposterous to say that the House of Commons could not discuss those Treaty obligations without coming to a vote. They were matters for calm and deliberate discussion. The Chancellor of the Exchequer said, very properly, that the speech of the Secretary of State for War was conclusive. It was very natural that one Cabinet Minister should think the speech of another Cabinet Minister conclusive; but it was part of the business of the Opposition not always to think the speech of a Cabinet Minister conclusive, and to endeavour to show by argument that it was not. The hon. Member for Mid-Lincolnshire had indulged in a very irregular proceeding that night, one which, after the dressing he had received, he was not likely to repeat. He hoped such an exhibition might never be presented in that House again, and that they would not suffer from a spectacle which would not present them in an agreeable aspect to the world, which was looking upon their conduct and expecting them to act with dignity. Whatever they did he hoped they would not resort to a practice of asking questions of people who they knew were not in a situation to answer them. There was a code of honour forbidding it which he hoped would be adhered to in future by hon. Gentlemen on the other side of the House. The question was, what were they to do with this debate? It did not seem to him to be a proper course on the part of the Government to say—"We have given our answer; that is conclusive, and we don't want any further debate. What you must do is to come here with a Resolution which we will vote down, and so get rid of the Eastern Question." ["No, no!"] That was what they wanted; but he ventured to say they could not vote down the Eastern Question. It was much too big, even for the Conservative majority, which for that purpose was absolutely in vain. None of their taunts and challenges would alter for a moment the course which the Opposition meant to take. They meant to submit this question to public discussion; and however much Gentlemen opposite might despise public meetings, the time was coming when, in consequence of an Act of Parliament known as the Septennial Act, they would not be able to treat those meetings with the contempt manifested by the hon. Member for Mid-Lincolnshire. There was a time when even county Members would have to face public meetings, and when the Opposition would be able to meet them. There were also odd occasions when vacancies arose when they would also have to face public meetings. He was pleased to see his hon. Friend the Member for Frome (Mr. Samuelson) again occupying his seat below the Gangway. There were occasions when public meetings could not be treated with the scorn which the Conservative Party, with its existing majority, had treated them. Let them not, therefore, expect that upon a question of that kind they would force them to bring down a cut-and-dried Resolution in order that they might bring up their majority and so dispose of the Eastern Question. That was not a practical or statesman-like way of dealing with the question. A question of very great importance had been raised, and the House had had a very serious statement from the Secretary of State for War—namely, that, in his opinion, we had Treaty engagements, which if we were called on to fulfil and did not fulfil would place us in a humiliating position. He had a question to ask of the Government on that. How were they going to deal with that situation in respect of the English nation? It was nonsense to ask the Opposition how they were going to deal with it. That was for the Government, who had got the majority, to say. By the voice of a Cabinet Minister that evening—not a mere diplomatic despatch—they had been told that we were under Treaty obligations which if we were called upon by one or two foreign Powers to put in force we should be placed in a humiliating position. The people of England, in those meetings which were so much despised, had told the Government—"You shall not make war in defence of Turkey." When, before those meetings, had there been any declaration on the part of a Member of the Government that they would not go to war for Turkey? Why, the Government sent a Fleet to Besika Bay; and he well remembered hearing the hon. Member for West Cumberland (Mr. Percy Wyndham), who had taunted the Opposition that night with being a War Party, congratulate the Government on having sent the Fleet to Besika Bay. No; hon. Members on the Ministerial side were not a War Party now, because they could not fight the people they wanted to fight; they could not fight the people they would gladly have fought. But if nobody gave the Government an indication of what was the opinion of the country, they could hunt the game as they liked, and the hounds were then in full cry. What was the object of the Government in sending the Fleet to Besika Bay? It was said it had been sent there for the defence of the Christians; but was that the fact? Some very remarkable light was thrown upon that event in the Blue Books. Lord Salisbury found the Fleet at Besika Bay, and he, who at all events was in earnest in endeavouring to give effect to the policy which he had been sent to Constantinople to carry out, wrote a despatch in which he said—

"Admiral Drummond finds it necessary to leave Besika. I have requested that he may take the Fleet to Athens instead of Salonica, in order to avoid misconstruction, and to support my assertion that no assistance is to be expected from Her Majesty's Government."

in order to convince the Turkish Government that our Government was in earnest at the time when it said it was not going to support Turkey; and he should like to know what meaning was attached by the Turks to the sending of the Fleet to Besika Bay? Upon that point the House was not left in doubt, because it was stated in a remarkable despatch from Sir Henry Elliot, dated the 29th of August, what was the real object for which the Fleet was sent to Besika Bay. It was said it was to protect the Christians, and simple people at home thought the crews of the Fleet were to go on shore and defend the Christians if they were attacked by the Turks. That, however, was not the policy of the Government. On the contrary, their object was to protect the Christians by giving the Turks the assurance that they would have English support, so that they might not be led through panic to massacre the Christians. Sir Henry Elliot said—

“The knowledge that the British Squadron was at Besika Bay made them believe that they were not entirely deserted, and they did not give way to those feelings of desperation under which they would have laid waste the whole country.”

That was the way in which the presence of the Fleet protected the Christians, and were not those who sat on his side of the House justified, he would ask, under the circumstances, in saying that the conduct of the English Government did require watching, and in protesting against it? The charge of the hon. Member for Mid-Lincolnshire against his right hon. Friend the Member for Greenwich that he had caused the agitation which had sprung up throughout England, and had embarrassed the policy of the Government, was therefore absurd. In a despatch dated the 30th of August, days before his right hon. Friend had either spoken or written a word on the subject, it was stated that—

“The sympathy of the Russian people in the Servian cause had already reached such a height that if the war continued the Government would inevitably be obliged to declare openly in its favour, and there was not a Power in Europe to which the Porte could turn with the slightest hope of meeting with support. Public feeling in England had been so much outraged by all that had taken place in Bulgaria, that even if Russia declared war against Turkey, it would be impossible for Her Majesty's Government to interfere in her behalf. The Ministers expressed lively indignation at the manner in which they had been treated by Europe.”

[Mr. CHAPLIN: I did not say that the agitation was caused by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich.] But was there or was there not good reason why his right hon. Friend should be disposed to distrust the policy of the Government? In a despatch of Sir Henry Elliot's, dated September 3, he said, speaking of the Turks—

“They are perfectly aware that they could not carry on a war with Russia with the slightest prospect of success, and yet they seem ready to risk the utter ruin it would bring upon them rather than give way to the representations of the united Cabinets of Europe.”

Sir Henry Elliot went on to say—

“As long as they could hope that, after following our advice, they had more chance of material support from us, if the necessity for it should arise, our words had more weight with them than can be expected when they believe that we should rather abandon them to be dealt with by their enemies, than interfere actively in their behalf.”

After such a statement it was impossible to suppose that hon. Members would not express their opinion on the policy which the Government were then pursuing. It was quite out of the question that a solemn discussion on so serious a matter as this should be concluded by an explosion of temper such as had just occurred on the other side of the House. That was not the manner in which a Government or its supporters ought to deal with a question like this. Instead of encouraging these violent attacks and outbreaks of temper on the Benches behind him, he thought the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer would not fulfil his high office if he did not restrain them.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: With regard to the Business of next week, there is Business on Monday and Thursday which it would be inconvenient to defer. The Universities Bill is down for Monday, and other Government Bills are to be proceeded with on Thursday. What I propose is this—that if the right hon. Gentleman opposite desires to renew this debate, it would be better to allow it to stand over with the view to its being taken on Friday next. [An hon. MEMBER: Monday.] I think it would be more convenient that it should be renewed on Friday.

adjourn a debate of this importance for a whole week. It is, I think, rather early for the Government to appropriate a private Members' day. There can hardly be any urgency about the Order which stands on the Paper for Monday.

MR. JOSEPH COWEN: May I suggest that the Resolution before the House is of a very indefinite character. Would it not be better to join issue with the Government on some distinct point?

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL said, he was one of the private Members who had given way in order that the question might be brought before the House. He should unwillingly give way again unless it should be deliberately settled that the Eastern Question should be directly taken up and directly debated by the House. In his opinion, the Treaties of 1856 had come to an end. Lord Salisbury had himself torn up those Treaty engagements of the past, and taken a new departure in concert with the other Powers; and the question now was not as to the past but as to the future.

LORD ELCHO: It was with extreme pleasure I heard from the Secretary of State for War that the Government, as a Government, are not prepared to have recourse to force with reference to the internal administration of the Turkish Government. The speeches from the other side which I have heard and read seem to imply that they are prepared to throw this country into war for the question involved in the internal administration of Turkey. If they are in earnest the matter should be decided; if they do not mean what they say, the sooner there is an end to their speeches the better. This question should be decided one way or the other before the eyes of Europe, and in the interests of our common country some one on that side ought to come forward and test the opinions of the House of Commons upon it. If no one opposite will do that, some one should be found to do so.

MR. SULLIVAN said, he hoped no hon. Gentleman on that side of the House would be led to adopt the course recommended by the noble Lord. Let the House be first made aware what the policy of the Government really was. For his own part, he could not tell from the speeches of Members of the Government what, or, rather, which, was the policy of Her Majesty's Government.

The Marquess of Hartington

EARL PERCY desired to call the attention of hon. Members to the Question immediately before the House, which was the Question of adjourning the debate. To adjourn a debate on a question of this importance, on which no decision could be arrived at, would either simply impede the business of the country or deprive private Members of an opportunity of discussing their Motions. If the Opposition chose to raise an issue as to the policy of the Government or the effect of our Treaty obligations it could be debated in the usual way.

MR. ANDERSON contended that if the Government went to the country they would find a very different result from that which so astonished them at the last Election.

MR. PELL reminded the House that the adjournment had been moved by the hon. Member for Mid-Lincolnshire in order to enable the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Gladstone) to reply to the questions he had addressed to him.

Question put, and agreed to.

In reply to a Question as to the day for resuming the debate,

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, that the Amendment would now stand as the first Question when Supply was called on. It usually rested with the Government to fix the order of Business on Monday and Thursday, and it seemed to him reasonable that the adjourned debate should be taken as the First Order for next Friday.

Debate adjourned till Friday next.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

ROUMANIA—TREATY OF COMMERCE.
QUESTION.

LORD CAMPBELL rose to put a Question, of which he had given private Notice, to the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs. In reply to an inquiry made by him in the latter part of last Session, the noble Earl (the Earl of Derby) said that a diplomatic Correspondence would, when produced, clear up certain inconsistencies in relation to the negotiations for a Treaty of Commerce with Roumania. He wished to know, Why that Correspondence had not been included in the Blue Book on the Eastern Question; and he also wished to ask whether there would be any objection to its production?

THE EARL OF DERBY said, he should be very happy to produce the Correspondence which his noble Friend wished to see. It was not yet in print; but when it was printed he would lay it on the Table, in order that the House might be in possession of all the information on the subject as far as the negotiations at present went. His noble Friend asked why this Correspondence had not been printed in the Blue Book on the Eastern Question. For two reasons—first, it related to an entirely distinct and separate subject; secondly, the Blue Book was already very voluminous, and the Government had not thought it right to increase its bulk by what could be conveniently printed as separate Papers.

House adjourned at a quarter past Five o'clock, till To-morrow, half-past Ten o'clock.

THE RECENT FLOODS—THE THAMES COMMISSION.—QUESTION.

SIR CHARLES RUSSELL asked the President of the Local Government Board, Whether, having regard to the serious injury caused by the flooding of the River Thames and its tributaries, it is the intention of Government to introduce any measure with a view to mitigating this evil for the future?

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH, in reply, said, the general question of the damage done by the recent floods had engaged his attention and also that of his right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Home Department. He had caused information to be collected which might be useful in the event of legislation, or for the purpose of determining whether legislation was necessary or not. With regard to the special case of the Thames, the Conservancy Commissioners had made a very full and detailed allusion to the subject in their annual Report, which had, he believed, been presented to the House by his right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade. That Report, he hoped, would in a few days be in the hands of his hon. and gallant Friend, and he would suggest to him that he should renew the Question after he had had the opportunity of seeing it.

HOME FARM COLLIERY, LANARK.
QUESTION.

MR. MACDONALD asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, If it be correct that eight days or thereby previous to the final inundation of the Home Farm Colliery, near Hamilton, in the county of Lanark, that the water burst into that mine or colliery; if the work of a seam, under the Ell Seam, where the bodies of the four men who lost their lives are supposed to lie, was stopped from the inflow of the water; whether [the principal Inspector of the district or his assistant visited the mine during the whole of the week that the water continued to flow into the mine; if so, what were the directions he gave; and if, having regard to the whole circumstances, there is evidence to show that the mine should not have been stopped before the final burst of the water?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS, in reply, said, that in answer to the first part of the Question of the hon. Member, he had to state that it was true that eight days before the final inundation a fall in the roof had taken place in the extreme workings; that in consequence of that fall the work of the lowest seam was stopped from the inflow of water, but the men went on working in the middle seam. With regard to the third part of the Question, whether the principal Inspector of the district visited the mine during the whole of the week, he had to say that the Inspector was not aware of anything having taken place in the mine at all until the morning of the accident, no notice having been given to him of the water having got in eight days before. He was told that the persons in charge of the mine did consult the Duke of Hamilton's mineral agent, who was a gentleman of great skill and experience. That gentleman went down and gave his advice as to what ought to be done, and stated that no further accident was expected. With regard to the last part of the Question, he was not able to say from any information before him at present that the mine should not have been stopped before the final burst of the water; but the Procurator Fiscal was making an independent inquiry into the whole circumstances of the case, and he should wait until that inquiry was completed before taking further steps in the matter. The information at present before him did not lead to the conclusion that the men should have ceased working.

MR. MACDONALD gave Notice that to-morrow he would ask the Home Secretary, if he would not direct a special inquiry to be made into the circumstances of the case, seeing that a destruction of human life had been involved in it?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS thought the hon. Member could not have heard what he had said. He had stated that the Procurator Fiscal was making a special independent inquiry at the present moment; and when he heard from that officer, he should be happy to consider whether any further inquiry would be necessary. The hon. Member had, therefore, better wait the result of that inquiry, which was already in progress, before asking the Question.

THE QUEEN'S COLLEGES, IRELAND.— LEGISLATION.—QUESTION.

MR. LYON PLAYFAIR asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland, Whether he intends to present to Parliament the report recently made by a Treasury Commission on the state of the Queen's Colleges, and if he proposes during the present Session to bring in any measure to carry out the recommendations of that report?

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH: This, Sir, was a Departmental Commission, and the inquiry was mainly of a financial character. Many gentlemen occupying official positions in connection with the Queen's University and its Colleges gave evidence before the Commissioners, and I am by no means sure that it would be fair to these gentlemen to publish their evidence either in extenso or in the Report of the Commission. If that objection can be overcome, I should be glad that the Report should be published, as it is of a very satisfactory nature. I propose to refer such of the recommendations of the Commissioners as are not purely financial to the Senate of the Queen's University; and when the Government have had the advantage of receiving the views of the Senate upon them, I hope we may be able to make some recommendation to the House upon the subject during the present Session. But I do not think that any legislation is likely to be required.

THE NORTHERN PACIFIC RAILWAY. QUESTION.

MR. ERRINGTON asked the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, If he will state what steps are being taken by the Government of the Dominion of Canada to carry out that part of the agreement sometimes known as the Carnarvon Compromise, which provides for the immediate construction of the insular portion of the Northern Pacific Railway; and, whether he has any objection to lay upon the Table copies of a Memorial on this subject addressed to Her Majesty's Government in the early part of last year by the House of Representatives of British Columbia, and of Lord Carnarvon's reply?

MR. J. LOWTHER: Sir, the Bill introduced by the Dominion Government for the construction of the railway from Esquimalt to Nanaimo, on Vancouver's Island—which is not admitted by that Government to be an integral part of the Pacific Railway—was thrown out in the Senate, and, after considering the circumstances, and ascertaining that the cost of that railway would exceed what had been contemplated, the Dominion Government proposed that the Province should receive a sum of money in lieu of that railway, and in compensation for the delays in the construction of the Pacific Railway. This proposal has not been accepted by the Province, and Lord Carnarvon has recommended that the further consideration of the point should be deferred until after the completion of the surveys and the western terminus of the Pacific Railway on the mainland has been decided upon, when an opinion can be formed as to the further proposals which, under all the difficult conditions of the question, may fairly and reasonably be made by the Dominion Government. Papers on the subject are being printed; but it would not be convenient to present them at this moment, although I have no objection to their being presented at a future time.

MERCHANT SHIPPING ACTS—COMBUSTIBLE CARGOES.—QUESTION.

MR. GOURLEY asked the President of the Board of Trade, If his attention has been called to the dangerous manner in which gunpowder and other combustibles are conveyed in cargo and passenger ships; if he is aware that large quantities of gunpowder are shipped in loose kegs with no other preventive against explosion save a few deals and sails in lieu of properly-constructed magazines; and, what measures he intends adopting in order to put a stop to a custom alike dangerous to life and property?

SIR CHARLES ADDERLEY: Sir, passenger ships under the Act of 1855 cannot take as cargo gunpowder, vitriol, lucifer matches, &c., or any articles deemed by the emigration officer dangerous to the health or safety of passengers. But as to ships carrying less than 50 adult emigrants, or steamers carrying any number of cabin passengers, the Merchant Shipping Act of 1873 provides rules for marking and packing any dangerous goods in any vessel, British or foreign, with power to refuse such cargo, or throw it overboard, or with forfeiture. The Explosive Substances Act, 1875, requires certain kinds of packing cases to be used for explosives, and gives harbour authorities the duty of making bye-laws about storage and loading within their jurisdiction, and the Board of Trade Inspectors may inquire into the observance of the Act; and by Orders in Council explosives are defined and classified. The Merchant Shipping Act, 1876, gives the Board of Trade power to detain ships for improper loading; and under this a statement of the law on the subject and general instructions have been drawn up for circulation, which I will lay on the Table. We cannot inspect the loading of every ship, but we act in all cases of improper loading which are brought to our notice. There is, therefore, ample power to check improper loading of gunpowder and other combustibles, and I am not aware that "large quantities are shipped in loose kegs with no precautions," as stated by the hon. Member.

NEWFOUNDLAND—THE FRENCH SHORE.—QUESTION.

MR. A. M'ARTHUR asked the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether the attention of Her Majesty's Government has been called to the remarks made by the Chief Justice of Newfoundland, when passing sentence upon a prisoner who was found guilty of manslaughter, on the "so-called French shore" of that island, and especially of his statement that along more than one hundred miles of that coast there is not a single magistrate or a solitary constable to whom application for redress or protection can be made; and that in regard to crimes committed within this area nothing has been done to bring offenders to justice, so that unless persons defend their lives and property by their own hand, they have no means of protection; and, whether it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government to take early steps to remedy the evil complained of, and to establish some authority to maintain peace and order on that portion of the shore to which the Chief Justice refers?

• MR. J. LOWTHER, in reply, said, attention had been called to the subject, and steps had already been taken by Her Majesty's Government towards appointing magistrates to administer the law in that portion of the colonies. They were in communication with the Newfoundland Government as to the details of the necessary arrangements.

ARMY—SERVICE IN INDIA.

QUESTION.

MR. J. HOLMS asked the Secretary of State for War, If Her Majesty's Government had yet come to any decision regarding the arrangements by which adequate provision for the Military requirements of India may be combined with short service in the Army at home?

MR. GATHORNE HARDY: Sir, I mentioned last Session that I had addressed to the India Office the proposals which I thought calculated to remedy the evil they complained of, and those proposals, I understand, have been referred to the three Presidencies in India, and until they have reported on them I suppose I shall receive no answer on the subject.

THE EDUCATION CODE, 1876— ARTICLE 60.—QUESTION.

MR. KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH asked the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education, with reference to Article 60 of the Code, 1876, When he will state what rules or principles guide the Education Department in granting or withholding the provisional certificate (for service in small schools) which, upon special recommendation by the inspector, they may give to pupil teachers who have completed their engagement with credit, and who have passed satisfactorily their fifth year's examination, or that referred to in Article 94; and, whether, seeing that the grant to such small schools (with an annual average attendance of not more than sixty scholars) employing teachers of this kind, is dependent on the granting or withholding of such certificates, he will take steps to publish or embody in the Code the rules of the Education Department on this subject? He also asked, When the new Code will be in the hands of Members?

VISCOUNT SANDON: Sir, the only condition, beyond those stated in Article 60 of the Code, which is required to enable a pupil teacher to receive a provisional certificate is, that he should be reported by one of Her Majesty's Inspectors to be an efficient teacher. As my hon. Friend has pointed out that some misunderstanding may exist on the subject, we have inserted a few words in the Code of this year to make the matter perfectly clear. I hope that in a few days the Code will be delivered to hon. Members.

FREE LIBRARIES RETURN.

QUESTION.

MR. JAMES asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, When the Return relating to Free Libraries, moved for June 24, 1875, will be issued?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS, in reply, said, he believed that the Return would be laid on the Table during the present week.

NAVY—NAVIGATING OFFICERS.

QUESTION.

MR. ANDERSON asked the First Lord of the Admiralty, Whether it be not the fact that the concessions made by him to the navigating officers last year, through being restricted to the lowest rank, had resulted in supercession, junior navigating officers getting over the heads of their seniors in the same branch; and if he will look into the matter with a view of so extending the concessions as to avoid that grievance?

MR. HUNT: I believe, Sir, there has been no case at present in which junior navigating officers have been put over the heads of their seniors in the same branch; but I find it is possible that the thing might happen in a case which has been brought to my notice, and to that I am giving my attention. If the hon. Member will communicate with me on the exact point suggested by his Question I shall be happy to consider the matter.

NAVY—HOBART PASHA.—QUESTION.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL asked the First Lord of the Admiralty, Whether there will be any objection to lay upon the Table the Correspondence between Captain Hobart, the Admiralty, and the Foreign Office with reference to that Officer's removal from and restoration to the Navy, and to any intermediate applications from him; and also whether the calculation of his service for retired pay will be given?

MR. HUNT: There is no objection to lay the Correspondence on the Table. I stated what the retired pay was the other day.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL: What about the calculation?

MR. HUNT: The retired pay was calculated under the Order in Council, and the years during which the officer was not in the service were not taken into account.

THE TURKISH BLUE BOOK—EXPULSION OF THE TURKS FROM EUROPE. QUESTIONS.

MR. GLADSTONE asked Her Majesty's Government, Who are the "important personages" with respect to whom Sir Henry Elliot states in his Despatch of December 18th 1876, that they have made a "declaration that the Turks must be driven out of Europe;" and, whether Her Majesty's Government will lay upon the Table the Telegram referred to in the foot-note of Paper I. 105, as containing the substance of the Despatch of September 5th?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: With regard to the second part of the Question put by my right hon. Friend, there will be no objection to lay the telegram on the Table. I may take this opportunity of correcting a misprint in the date of the telegram. It is stated as the 22nd of August. It should be the 29th. With respect to the first part of the Question, I am not aware who are the particular persons whom Sir Henry Elliot had in his mind; but I am aware that there was a very widely-spread impression in this country that my right hon. Friend himself had recommended a policy something of that character. At all events, such an impression prevailed in this country; and I think it is very probable that it prevailed also in Constantinople. But whether that was what Sir Henry Elliot had in his mind when he wrote that despatch I am not informed.

MR. GLADSTONE: Will there be any objection on the part of the Government—I do not think it is an unreasonable request—to inquire of Sir Henry Elliot who the persons referred to were?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I have no objection, and I presume there would not be. I tried myself to see Sir Henry Elliot, but he was out of town.

ARMY—CRIMINAL OFFENCES IN MILITARY DISTRICTS.—QUESTION.

COLONEL NAGHTEN asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether he has received any information at the Home Office tending to show that a great number of criminal offences are committed in some districts where large bodies of troops are stationed, resulting in convictions which throw heavy expenses upon the counties where such convictions take place; and, if so, whether, in order to prevent such offences and to diminish such expenses, he is prepared to recommend that additional police be provided in those localities at the cost of the Government?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS, in reply, said, that he had not up to present moment received any complaints on the subject, but he had ordered inquiry to be made, and if he found such cases existing he would deal with them.

ARMY RE-ORGANIZATION, &c. QUESTION.

GENERAL SIR GEORGE BALFOUR asked the Secretary of State for War, If he will name the person who handed in to the Royal Commission on Promotion and Retirement the memorandum printed as Appendix N, containing suggestions for altering the existing organization and the ranks of the Line, which, if altered, as stated in the Report of the Commissioners, might remove the necessity for any compulsory retirement in the lower ranks; and, whether, before applying to the Treasury for more money for the Army, he will cause a public inquiry to be instituted into the question of Army re-organization, which the Royal Commissioners did not enter upon, as they did not conceive it to be within their province to deal with it; the question referred to them being, "How to create the necessary promotion under the existing organization?"

MR. GATHORNE HARDY, in reply, said, the question of organization was one of the efficiency of the Army, and had nothing to say to promotion and retirement as a money question. If it was necessary to re-organize the Army it would be just as necessary to have arrangements for promotion and retirement as it would be in the other case. He must decline to make another inquiry into Army re-organization.

TRIAL OF ELECTION PETITIONS— LEGISLATION.—QUESTION.

MR. O'CONOR asked Mr. Attorney General, Whether the Bill he proposes to introduce on the subject of the Trial of Election Petitions will be substantially the same as the one which was read a first time on the 8th August; and, if so, whether there is any hope of its being brought in at an earlier period this year?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL, in reply, said, that the Bill he proposed to bring in upon this subject would be substantially the same as the measure which was read the first time in August last, but he hoped to be able to introduce it very soon.

LOCAL TAXATION—IRELAND.

QUESTION.

MR. WILLIAM JOHNSTON asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland, When the Report of the Commissioners, who recently sat in various towns in Ireland, to inquire into matters connected with local taxation, will be ready to be laid upon the Table of the House?

SIR MICHAEL HICKS - BEACH: Sir, I understand that the first Report of the Commissioners, which will, I believe, refer to all the towns into which they have inquired, except Belfast, Cashel, Trim, and Wicklow, will be ready in a day or two; and I will endeavour to accelerate the printing and distribution of

it among hon. Members as much as possible. Their second Report will refer to the four towns named, and will, I hope, be ready in a fortnight or three weeks at latest. There appear to be special subjects of importance respecting these towns which have caused delay in the matter.

CHINA—THE EXPEDITION TO YUNNAN.—QUESTION.

MR. STEWART asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, When the remainder of the Papers connected with the Expedition to Yunnan, including Mr. Grosvenor's Report, and also any Papers on the recent Convention between Sir Thomas Wade and the Chinese Government, will be laid upon the Table?

MR. BOURKE, in reply, said, they would be ready in a few days.

PARLIAMENT—PUBLIC BUSINESS. QUESTION.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL, in view of the adjourned debate on the Eastern Question, inquired, What would be the course of Public Business on Thursday and Friday next?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER, in reply, said, that the Prisons Bills were down for Thursday. The Prisons Bill for England would be in Committee, and the Prisons Bill for Scotland stood for the second reading. On Friday the Order for Supply stood first as a matter of course, but what course would be adopted in regard to the adjourned debate of last Friday he was unable to say.

UNIVERSITIES OF OXFORD AND CAMBRIDGE BILL—[BILL 2.]

(Mr. Gathorne Hardy, Mr. Assheton Cross, Mr. Walpole.)

Order for Second Reading read,

MR. GATHORNE HARDY, in moving that the Bill be now read a second time, expressed a hope that, notwithstanding the Notice of Opposition which stood on the Paper in the name of the hon. Member for Cavan (Mr. Biggar), the Bill would meet with the favourable reception which was accorded to the separate Bills for the Universities of

Oxford and Cambridge last year. He had supposed the hon. Member's Notice was intended merely to put a stop to the practice of carrying on Business into the small hours of the morning; but it had come to his (Mr. Hardy's) knowledge that the hon. Member had been visiting the neighbourhood of the Universities, and had possibly been engaged in collecting information for the purpose of making an onslaught on the Bill; but he (Mr. Hardy) hoped that such would not be the case, and that the hon. Member would put no obstacle in the way of that improvement of the Universities which the best friends of education wished to accomplish. He had thought it best to introduce the Bill in pretty nearly the same form as that in which the two Bills came before the House last year, because no opportunity had been afforded of discussing the Amendments then put upon the Paper, and, consequently, there had been no means of ascertaining the feeling of the House upon them. In consequence, however, of some criticisms which had been passed last year by more than one speaker, that resident Oxford was not sufficiently represented on the Commission, it had been thought right to appoint certain Commissioners who were still resident at the Universities, but, at the same time, to retain the number of Commissioners at seven; and, therefore, steps had been taken to ascertain whether any of the former Commissioners could retire without feeling hurt in any way. The Dean of Chichester and Sir Henry Maine had made vacancies, and the latter had, indeed, previously intimated that he thought that an Oxford man and a resident would be better able to serve than himself. In place then of those Gentlemen, to whom he felt very much obliged for their courtesy, the Government had secured the services of Dr. Bellamy, Master of St. John's, Oxford, and Professor Smith, who, as Savilian Professor of Geometry, was well known in University circles, and far beyond them. He was quite sure, therefore, that so far as the new Commission was concerned there would be no further complaint about Oxford residents not being sufficiently represented. There was another alteration in the Bill which he might mention. Last year the Commissioners were to have power to extend their operations till the year 1883; in the present Bill they were limited to 1881. It appeared to him that there was a good deal of justice in the complaints which were made last year as to the great length of time allowed to the Commissioners, and it was not desirable that the Universities should be exposed too long to the trouble and commotion which these investigations caused. It was therefore important that they should be relieved of a state of uncertainty as soon as possible, and no one was more desirous than himself to see them at liberty to pursue their course of usefulness without interference from the Legislature. He thought that when they were once started on their career they would know better what was for their advantage than anyone outside. During the Recess nothing, so far as he was aware, had passed of a nature to modify the opinions he expressed on the subject last year. He did not think the debates of last year were at all adverse to inquiry by a Commission, though they were against any extravagant extension of the Professoriate and against the absolute destruction of non-resident Fellowships. Respecting the former point, the opinion of the House appeared to be that while there was a necessity for an increase of the Professoriate, there should not be such an extravagant and extraordinary extension of it as had been put forward by many persons. With regard to the introduction of the Bills of last year into that House, he observed that some very amusing criticisms had been passed by a gentleman of great distinction and a great deal of humour—he meant the Rector of Lincoln College; and to those criticisms he might now refer, inasmuch as they affected not only himself, but the House of Commons generally. Mr. Pattison seemed to have found himself at that great social gathering—the Social Science Congress—where some merriment was needed, and he certainly succeeded in raising a good deal of laughter by his sketch of what passed in that House on the subject of one of the University Bills. Mr. Pattison said—

“In introducing the Bill Lord Salisbury intimated that one purpose of the measure was to promote science and learning. I confess I was taken aback by this announcement of our Chancellor. To patronize science and learning has always been assumed to be the exclusive prerogative of the party calling itself Liberal. . . . The strange incongruity of Lord Salisbury proclaiming a reform of the Universities in the interests of science was a phenomenon which I could not interpret. But we were not left long in this perplexity. When the Oxford Bill got down into the Commons the Member of the Cabinet who had charge of it then hastened to disavow any such intentions on the part of his Government. . . . Members of the Government in the Lower House vied with each other in eagerly repudiating any intention of making the University a seat of learning and science. This had been an unauthorized escapade of their impulsive Colleagues in the Lords. This disavowal was well received in the House. Antagonism was half disarmed. The Member for the learned University of Oxford received the congratulations of the Member of the learned University of London in having done with all that nonsense."

When some gentleman in the columns of an influential journal, Nature, had said that £800,000 a-year would be wanted for the endowment of Research, and that was about the income of the two Universities, he (Mr. Hardy) thought that that was somewhat too great a demand, and certainly did express some astonishment at the suggestion, but that was rather different from the amusing language attributed to him by Mr. Pattison. As for Mr. Pattison's other observations, he felt bound to say that to make the Universities the seat of science and learning and to improve the position which they had occupied with so much advantage to both science and learning hitherto was the main object of the Bill. Though objection had been taken in the debates of last Session to the special mode in which many persons suggested to endow Research, yet no one took objection to the other parts of the Bill, which proposed that the University should obtain aid from the Colleges; and, indeed, Mr. Pattison himself, in the strongest language, advocated that part of the Bill on the ground that the Colleges were nothing without the Universities, as the Universities were nothing without the Colleges. It was only fair to say that many of the Colleges had recognized it as their duty to contribute to the Universities, and had done so very freely; and it was rather hard that those who were not animated by so generous a spirit, and who yet had something to spare, should be at liberty to give nothing to the University from whom they received so many benefits. With regard to Fellowships, the Bill, he believed, would commend itself to the House. In the debates of last year the tenure of non-resident Fellowships was recognized as necessary for the benefit of both Universities; but it was not thought that they should be treated as life-prizes, if they were to be made wholly irrespective of any duties either to the Universities or to the Colleges. Then there was an almost unanimous feeling in favour of some extension of the Professoriate, and in extending the Professoriate the House would practically be extending Research; for it might be taken for granted that no man could teach who was not continually learning, and that no man who held a Professorship, particularly in natural science, could properly discharge his duties unless he was continually increasing his stock of knowledge and making investigations for himself. For the rest, he might say that among the alumni of the two Universities there was a general feeling that nothing ought to be done to injure the Colleges or to take away from the Universities their power of self-government when once they had been set a going in their new path. Accordingly, all that had been done was intended to put them on a proper footing for working more amicably with the University. That feeling, which was not confined to one side of the House, was universally entertained, except, he regretted to say, by his right hon. Friend the Member for the University of London (Mr. Lowe) who owed so much to the University of Oxford, and who was of opinion that the Universities to which the Bill referred failed to discharge what he regarded as the characteristics of a University. Without being mere Examining Bodies, such as his right hon. Friend was so fond of, the University educated classes in this country, which without them would never have obtained anything like a fit education; and there was a valuable action and reaction between these classes and the Universities. He thought, therefore, that it was hard to blame them, for they, he submitted, really did a very great work, and had produced some of the most eminent Members of that and the other House. In all the different Departments of Government, moreover, as well as in other spheres, it might be noticed that those institutions had borne their fair share in producing the men who had risen to distinction. He had been very much struck by a short article from the pen of Mr. Goldwin Smith, which showed that that gentleman still retained, after a period of absence from this country, and notwithstanding his well-known desire for improvements, all his old attachment to the Alma Mater. He seemed to be in favour of almost everything which was contemplated by the present Bill, and to wish that the University of Oxford, for which he had still so tender a regard, should in its main features be kept as it was. It would be wasting the time of the House to dilate further upon the objects of the Bill. As he had shown, it was proposed to appoint a Commission with the view of enabling the rich to assist the poor, and at the same time, in a great degree, to assist themselves, and with the view, moreover, of regulating the Fellowships more efficiently, of encouraging the foundation of additional Professorships in arts and sciences which were not at present sufficiently attended to, and, perhaps, of introducing improvements with regard to subjects which were already cared for. He begged to move the second reading of the Bill.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Gathorne Hardy.)

MR. LOWE said, he was sorry that in what he was about to say he must to some considerable extent repeat observations he had made last year. It was unavoidable, for the Bill was substantially the same as those of last year, and it was not in his power to produce a new set of arguments for the same case. He was induced to come forward early in the debate, because, on the previous occasion, it had been his fate to speak late, and he had been told—indeed it was the only reply he got from the Government—that the reason why his speech remained unanswered was that it answered itself. One was naturally unwilling to believe that that was the case, and he now hoped that this time he would succeed in inducing right hon. Gentlemen opposite to give a little more argument in reply than he was able to give to himself in the course of his speech. He regretted that the two Universities were comprehended in the same Bill, because in many respects their cases might differ, and arguments might apply to one which did not apply to the other. Again, a person who had been at one could not presume to speak with equal confidence of the other. Circumstances might arise, too, particularly with reference to the Commissions, making it desirable to pass that part of the Bill relating to one University and not that referring to the other. If it should happen that Cambridge was satisfied with the Commission and Oxford dissatisfied, it would be rather hard to put them both in the same position. He wished to call attention very seriously to the position in which this question now stood, and for that purpose he must refer to the course followed by the House when the subject came before it more than 20 years ago. It was, he thought, in 1850, that a Commission was appointed—and a singularly able and competent Commission it was—to inquire into and report upon the whole of the existing state of the University of Oxford. It did inquire and report, and threw a flood of light upon the subject. Ample time was given to weigh the recommendations of the Commission and to decide what should be done. The course then followed was exactly the opposite to the course now adopted. Government did not come down to the House and ask it to appoint a Commission with sweeping powers to carry out what changes might seem to them desirable. On the contrary, they deliberately studied the Report of the Commission and made up their minds what ought to be done, and, instead of throwing the responsibility off their own shoulders on to a Commission, they laid definite proposals before Parliament, and thus led to a definite intimation of what the Commissioners were required to do. This was at once a successful and constitutional course which must recommend itself for imitation to all friends of these ancient institutions. Now everything was changed. What he had described was done by a Liberal, an innovating Government. Now they were in Conservative hands; and what was the result? They knew that enormous changes had been made at the Universities, particularly at the University of Oxford; but they were left entirely in the dark as to whether the effect of those changes had been good or evil, and whether their direction was one which ought to be encouraged or checked. In profound ignorance of the state of things at the University of Oxford—for he preferred to speak of it only—they were asked to appoint a Commission, and give that Commission the largest and most sweeping powers, without any instructions at all as to the direction in which those powers were to be exercised. It was proposed, in short, that, without taking the trouble to make up their minds as to a single point, they should delegate to that Commission almost the whole power of Parliament. A worse precedent than that, and one more unworthy of a Conservative Government he could not imagine. In dealing with those great and ancient institutions, their first duty was to acquaint themselves with the existing state of things, and, secondly, they ought to consider with the utmost attention and deliberation what ought to be done. Then would be the time to lay proposals before Parliament. But how different was the course which had actually been taken! Probably they would be told there had been an examination; but into what? An examination into the manner in which the Universities and Colleges had done their work?—an examination into the state of education, the general morale and conduct of the Universities? Nothing of the kind. The examination had been merely pecuniary. There had only been an investigation to find out how much money the Colleges had got, in order to see how much might be taken from them. They had not taken the trouble to inquire into the necessity of any expenditure at all. What they had done, in fact, had been to convict these Colleges of possessing so much money, and they now wished to delegate persons to decide how it should be dealt with. Were hon. Gentlemen opposite prepared to say that that was a Conservative or a respectful way in which to deal with the ancient institutions of the country? Let him recommend them to consider the case of another great and powerful institution, which, whatever might be its merits, and whatever its faults, was certainly guilty of possessing an enormous sum of money. If the Church of England was found possessing large revenues, was that sufficient reason, without inquiring into the state of things, and how the Church had done its work, why they should take the money of the Church of England and apply it to other purposes? What difference was there between the two cases? Were the possession of the money and the desire to appropriate it the only two things to consider? Were they not setting a dangerous precedent which it might be sought afterwards to apply to other institutions besides the Universities? Beyond that, it was to be remarked that they had taken that step of delegating their business to others, without, at the same time, giving them the slightest guide as to the exercise of those great powers. For his part he felt strongly that they were deviating entirely from the old and sound course adopted more than 20 years ago, and that the deviation, instead of being for the better, was altogether for the worse. As to the constitution of the Commission, there was no occasion to repeat over again what he had said last year, and passing from it, he had only to remark that it was not at all satisfactory. They had heard a defence made for the University of Oxford, to the effect that it had done a great deal of good. But that rested on a fallacy. He pointed out last year that the term "University" was an ambiguous one. It had two senses. In one sense it was a corporate body separate and distinct from and placed over the Colleges, and in the other sense it was held to include them. In consequence of the ambiguity arising from those two significations they could make out a case for the Universities which the Universities did not deserve. Thus his right hon. Friend had said the Universities taught. If he meant all the Colleges, then he (Mr. Lowe) said they did more or less; but if he meant the body which was separate from the Colleges, it was its reproach and shame that it never taught at all. That was the way they were tricked with words in that matter. He was talking now of the University which was not inclusive, but exclusive, of the Colleges — of the body which superintended the examinations, and he said it would take a far more strongly-supported recommendation than he had yet heard to prove that it was worthy of any great addition of money being given to it. And the reason that he said it was not worthy was, that he could not find that it had made a good use of the powers and resources it already possessed. Its Professoriate, with some brilliant exceptions, were really of no use for instruction in the University; but, beside the Professoriate, it had most important duties to discharge. It was its duty to superintend the examination upon which students were admitted to the University, and to superintend the examinations by which they were admitted to degrees. Now he could not imagine a more important duty than that, and certainly none calling more imperatively for faithful discharge, because, if the University would raise to a reasonable standard the attainments required before admission to the Colleges, it would by that means give an immense impulse to all the schools of the country. But the examination was extremely and ridiculously easy, and such as very few people would fail in. In that respect the University had failed in doing its work. The work of the University was not to be measured, as was generally considered, by the numbers of those who specially distinguished themselves. The business of the University was with the great mass of the students, and was to be tested, not by a reference to a few men who attained eminence, but by what was done for ordinary men. What was the value of their certificate of the degree of Bachelor of Arts? In that respect the University was wanting; the standard was unjustifiably low; and in that way it had been the means of keeping down the education of the country. So low, indeed, was the standard, that a young man going up to Oxford might live there all his time in idleness, and yet be able to satisfy the standard required for a degree. Such was the result of the standard being absurdly low, and such being the faults of the University, ought not the House, before passing a Bill which would hand over blindfold to a Commission the money of the Colleges, to satisfy itself whether the charges which he now made and which were brought against it by others were or were not true? If true, was not the House bound to take measures to alter that state of things before proceeding further? Every one who knew Oxford was aware that Convocation had a great deal of important patronage, and that the system of non-resident masters voting as now was probably as bad a mode of conferring patronage as could possibly be devised. The constitution and proceedings of the Congregation, too, required to be considered, with reference to the admission to it of residents like chaplains who had no share in the business of the University, and should be submitted to the judgment of Parliament. Surely, then, it was not too much to ask that there should be some inquiry before the House gave its assent to such a revolution as that which was proposed. How much better would it be that it should have the Report of a Royal Commission to inquire whether the charges which he had mentioned were or were not really well founded. If he remembered aright, the powers of this Commission were to commence in 1878. They would lose very little if they continued their investigation up to that time. If Parliament was unwilling to take the trouble, the best thing it could do was to let the matter alone. The worst of all courses was to act without inquiry and without investigation, to arm persons as to whose fitness there was great difference of opinion with powers not inferior to an Act of Parliament. He made this protest on behalf of views generally supposed to be held on the other side of the House, and because he wished that their decisions should command the respect of the country and bear substantial fruit.

Mr. MOWBRAY said, he regretted that the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of London (Mr. Lowe), in his new-born zeal for ancient and venerable institutions, had declined to come forward and assert his convictions in a more definite way, but had contented himself with an unmeaning protest, which he delivered under the shelter of the hon. Gentleman the Member for Cavan (Mr. Biggar), who, although he put down a Motion for the rejection of the Bill, seemed to have left the House and abandoned his proposition. There had been some question whether the noble Lord the Leader of the Opposition, or the hon. Gentleman from the sister country, was to be the Leader on that occasion; but it seemed that the right hon. Gentleman was prepared to follow hon. Gentlemen below the Gangway. The right hon. Gentleman had favoured the House with exactly the same sort of speech which he had delivered on the subject last Session, although he (Mr. Mowbray) was glad to say that on the present occasion the right hon. Gentleman had omitted some of the more unpleasant personalities. He said there was only one Bill, whereas there ought to be two; that there had been no previous inquiry; that the constitution of the Commission was faulty; and then he proceeded, as he did last year, to inveigh against the Universities. With respect to his objection that there should be one, not two Bills, he (Mr. Mowbray) thought that the Government had done very wisely in consolidating the Bills. They recollected how on a previous occasion hon. Members, whilst discussing one Bill, referred to the other, and they were thus transgressing the Rules of the House by discussing a Bill that was not before it. It was true that in 1854 separate Bills were introduced; but that was the commencement of legislation on this subject, and it was a tentative measure. It would have been impossible at that time to have carried any one Bill as to both. Then the right hon. Gentleman complained that there had been no inquiry; but he must bear in mind that the present case was not at all parallel with that of 1854. Parliament at that time proceeded to legislate for the University of Oxford after the lapse of centuries. There was great necessity then for inquiry, but now they were in such close and intimate connection with the Universities that hon. Members on both sides of the House knew what was going on in both Universities, and the Commission proposed to be appointed would be able to avail itself of the experience which had been accumulated since 1852. Committees of the House of Lords had since that date inquired into and reported upon the Universities, and the Commissions had collected a mass of evidence as to the revenues of the Universities and other questions affecting their studies. He hardly knew on what grounds the right hon. Gentleman objected to the Commission. He objected to the Commission of last year, because it contained among its members the Dean of Chichester, and because another member, Sir Henry Maine, was in his opinion the alter ego of Lord Salisbury. But both these names had disappeared, and had been replaced by others against whom he made no objection. Two gentlemen better calculated to represent the University on both sides could not have been selected, or who would meet with more general acceptance in the University and in that House. He felt ashamed when he heard his right hon. Friend repeat his argument that the Universities taught nothing. When at the head of the Education Department his right hon.

Friend introduced the principle of payment by results, and he would ask the right hon Gentleman to look round that and the other House of Parliament, the Judicial Bench, and the right Reverend Bench, and inform the House if the Universities had not cause to be satisfied in that way with the results, and if men distinguished in the Church and State learnt nothing when at the Universities. Again, the right hon. Gentleman had remarked that the Universities had a set of Professors who taught nothing. Well, he would leave him to settle that point with his hon. Friends the Member for the City of Oxford (Sir William Harcourt) and the Member for Hackney (Mr. Fawcett). Were those hon. Gentlemen to be classed among the useless Professors who taught nothing? Really, he thought the right hon. Gentleman ought to be ashamed of bringing such accusations against the Alma Mater to whom he owed so much. The other matters to which the right hon. Gentleman had referred were matters of debate that could be considered in Committee. His right hon. Friend and Colleague who moved the second reading of the Bill had truly said that there existed in the House of Commons and in the Universities themselves a general coincidence of opinion that the time for legislation had arrived. Indeed, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the City of London would, if he had chanced to sit at the present moment on the Treasury Bench, himself have been a Party to the introduction of a Bill on the subject. There was a general consensus of opinion that the time had come for legislation, and therefore the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Lowe), if he wished to test the opinion of the House, ought not to have contented himself with this protest, but should have followed it up with a Motion. Mr. Goldwin Smith had indicated an opinion that the work could be better done by the proposed Committee of the Privy Council. He (Mr. Mowbray) looked upon the appointment of the Universities Committee as a valuable part of the Bill; but while such a Committee would be valuable as a permanent institution, it was necessary that the preliminary work should be done by a Commission such as had been appointed in 1854, and such as was nominated in this Bill, and who could, if necessary, make their inquiries on the spot. He believed the measure would meet with general acceptance in the House, and that the right hon. Gentleman would not have an opportunity of going into the Lobby with the hon. Member for Cavan.

MR. GRANT DUFF: I think, Sir, the last speaker has somewhat misunderstood the argument of my right hon. Friend the Member for the University of London (Mr. Lowe). I understand my right hon. Friend, while acknowledging great obligations to the University, considered as a congeries of Colleges, to say that the University in its corporate capacity, separated from the Colleges, does not do its duty fully. For my own part, I cannot rise to the ultra-Conservatism of my right hon. Friend—I agree much more with the sans culottism of the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War and the ultra-Revolutionists who sit near him. I had an opportunity of expressing my views about the Oxford Bill so fully last year that in the few remarks I shall make to-night I intend to touch only upon a single point, and that one in which the proposals of the Government in 1877 differ from their proposals in 1876. The point to which I allude is the composition of the Commission. I see that the name of Sir Henry Maine has been withdrawn. I can well understand that that is a great relief to a very busy man like Sir Henry Maine, and I can quite believe that it was very agreeable to him; but I think it is a pity, for the presence of an eminent Cambridge man and of an eminent Indian on the Oxford Commission would have had many advantages. On the other hand, it would be gross injustice not to admit that the Government has filled his place not only well, but admirably; and not only admirably, but by making the very best appointment which could possibly have been made. The Savilian Professor of Geometry is not merely in the first rank of European mathematicians, but he would be a man of very extraordinary attainments even if you could abstract from him the whole of his mathematical knowledge. He was the most distinguished scholar of his day at Oxford. He was even more distinguished, if I may say so without offence, than my hon. and learned Friend the Member for the county of Denbigh (Mr. Osborne Morgan), whom we knew at Oxford as a very brilliant scholar at a period long antecedent to the first appearance of a now venerable acquaintance, the Burials Bill. But Professor Smith's extraordinary attainments are the least of his recommendations for the office of Commissioner. His chief recommendations for that office are the solidity of his judgment, his great experience of Oxford business, his services on the Science Commission, and his conciliatory character, which has made him perhaps the only man in Oxford who is without an enemy, sharp as are the contentions of that very divided seat of learning. The right hon. Gentleman who is in charge of the Bill may think me rather insatiable if, approving so much of one appointment which he has made, I still raise the question whether the Commission might not be further improved. I do not think the right hon. Gentleman, who wishes, I am sure, for nothing but the good of the University, will give his experiment a fair trial if he does not represent on the Commission that side of science which, as I pointed out last year, is not represented on it. Surely, Sir, there should be upon it some one person who has studied one or other of the sciences into which life enters, and surely there should be also some one person who knows intimately what is going on in foreign Universities. There is nothing sacred in the number seven; and when we get into Committee, I trust that the right hon. Gentleman will either be able to grant, in some form or other, substantially what I ask, or convince me that it is unreasonable.

MR. OSBORNE MORGAN considered that the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War (Mr. Hardy), had chosen a right course in introducing the Bill first into the House of Commons; but he could not agree with the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of Oxford (Mr. Mowbray), that it was an advantage to include both Universities in one Bill, because, as Cambridge had the better provisions, those of Oxford might derive a certain advantage from being rubbed together with them. As to the personnel of the Commission, which was a matter of the utmost importance, the present Oxford Commission was a great improvement upon the last, and he desired to thank the right hon. Gentleman for having made the alteration. It was impossible to find, either in or out of Oxford, a man better qualified to serve upon a Commission than Professor Smith. He knew nothing personally of Dr. Belamy, but that Gentleman was the respectable head of a respectable College, and had a knowledge of the University with which he had to deal. He greatly regretted, however, the loss of Sir Henry Maine, who was not only a man of great intellectual culture, but of proved administrative capacity, and if it were found necessary to throw somebody overboard, he thought they might have found some other Jonah. He was also glad to welcome back his hon. Friend the Member for Northumberland (Mr. Ridley). Having said thus much, however, his approval of the Bill must come to an end. He regretted that the Government should not have thrown overboard that old man of the mountain—the “pious founder.” If you held to the wishes of pious founders, you would have to burn half of the persons whom you now proposed to benefit. He regretted very much, too, the clause disfranchising the junior Fellows, who were the life-blood of the Colleges. The clause as to Cambridge had been expunged, and he should endeavour in Committee to gain for Oxford the same advantage. Then, again, he regretted that the Government had not dealt with the subject of clerical Fellowships, which formed between one-third and one-half of the Fellowships in all the Colleges, and were the great blot upon our University system. These Fellowship were the test system in its most obnoxious form. They were bad both from an academical and an ecclesiastical point of view, for he feared that the men attracted to the Church by these Fellowships made neither good Fellows, nor good clergy. It was said that it was desirable to retain clerical Fellowships in order to encourage the study of theology; but there could be no greater delusion, for you could no more encourage the study of theology by such means than you could encourage the study of jurisprudence by requiring a certain number of Fellows to be called to the Bar, or the study of chemistry by requiring a certain number of Fellows to practise as chemists and druggists. His main objection, however, was to the principle of the Bill, if he could use such a term in reference to a Bill that had really no principle; and the ground of his objection was that a power which was practically unlimited was given to seven men without preliminary inquiry, without defining the lines upon which they were to act; and with it they would be able to suppress Headships, to suppress Fellowships, to suppress Scholarships, even to suppress whole Colleges. He would not give such power to the Seven Wise Men if they could be found. The Bill was said to be so framed because the University was poor and the Colleges were rich. Now, much might, no doubt, be said for the German or Professorial system; but, judging by results, no Universities in the world could show such results as Oxford and Cambridge. In Trinity College, Cambridge, were to be seen, side by side, the statues of Bacon, Newton, Whewell, and Macaulay; and the College that produced such men, let alone such a scholar as Bentley and such a statesman as Pitt, had surely given pretty good proofs that it was worthy of being entrusted with the task of educating Englishmen. At a banquet recently given by his (Mr. Morgan's) own College at Oxford, Balliol, there were present, or might have been present, the head of the English Church, the Archbishop of Canterbury; the head of the Roman Catholic Church in England, Cardinal Manning; one of the Lord Chief Justices; the Leader of the House of Commons, the ex-President of the Royal Society, the Head of the Civil Service, and a number of other men of distinction, such as the Dean of Westminster and Mr. Matthew Arnold. If you asked these eminent men how they had become what they were, would they say that it was by attending the class-rooms of Professors or by acquiring a smattering of Chinese, Slavonic, Mongolian, or Tartaric? On the contrary, they would say that to this decried Collegiate system they owed that thorough education in the true sense of the word which had served them in good stead in after life—that through it they had learnt thoroughly what they professed to learn, and had thus acquired a sound substructure upon which to build in after life. To say that the Collegiate system needed improvement was simply to say that it was human; but that system had produced great and good men, and it was therefore not without some compunction that he saw this proposal to hand over these enormous powers to these “ancient mariners," who would embark on an unknown sea, bound for an unknown port, without either chart or compass to guide them on their way.

MR. BERESFORD HOPE said, that the speech to which the House had just listened caused in his mind alternate dissent and strong agreement, succeeding each other like the figures in a kaleidoscope. As to the extremely ingenious speech of the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Lowe) it might be practically put in this way—"Our old Universities are so sacred and useful that you should not touch them with an unhallowed hand; and my reason for so saying is that from experience I can pronounce them to be so useless." This is a fair summing up of that speech. With the main point of the speech of the hon. and learned Member who had just sat down he (Mr. Beresford Hope) thoroughly agreed—namely, as to the preservation of the Collegiate system, and he would also have joined the hon. Member in his opposition, if he had, like him, read the Bill as giving unlimited powers to the "ancient mariners" to carry off the precious cargo. But he saw those rovers of the sea fast bound by every Conservative check from Universities, Colleges, persons interested, Judicial Committee, and Parliament; and therefore, looking at the measure with the amount of checks and counter-checks it provided, he thought that however moderately potent it might or might not be for good, at least it would not be potent for the evil apprehended by the hon. and learned Member. The more safe alternative suggested by his hon. and learned Friend would, as he believed, be really found by far more risky. It must be read in the light of the last year's suggestion of the right hon. Member for the Universities of Edinburgh and St. Andrews, who had suggested a national Commission of non-University men to overhaul every one of the Universities, on the plea which he rode so hard that they were national institutions—that was, institutions without a continuous historical character of their own. If that suggestion were adopted, what would happen? An inquisitorial Commission would after much contention be somehow hit off, and would keep the Universities and Colleges in hot water for a year or two. That Commission would make its Report, while Parliament would very likely be dissolved, and the two Parties change sides across the House. So that Report in another Parliament would be embodied in another Bill, that new Parliament being elected on Heaven knew what cry. A new and now Executive Commission would then be instituted by another Government, of which the two right hon. Gentlemen would probably be Members—the Members for the Universities of London and Edinburgh, as well as the hon. and learned Member for Denbighshire, full of "national" action, and with a phalanx of advanced supporters below the Gangway to pacify. The result of that course of proceeding, he feared, would be far more fatal to the system of self-government of Fellowships and of tuition at the Colleges than the quiet, sober, and domestic provisions of the present measure. There was an old and hallowed maxim—"Agree with thine adversary quickly, whiles thou art in the way with him!" and, therefore, seeing in the future the phantasm of Professorial instruction, and that uncontrolled craving after "Research" which came to us under the aspect of £1,000 a-year, he was now anxious to make, as much as he could, friends with individuals who might prove to be troublesome in the days when the Conservatism of the right hon. Member for the University of London and Edinburgh, and the hon. and learned Member for Denbighshire, would not improbably thaw under the warm sun of the Ministerial bench. He did not approve of the rolling of the two Universities into one Bill, and he should therefore the more jealously watch the provisions affecting Cambridge.

MR. LYON PLAYFAIR: I presume there is a general accord in this House that we are fully justified in dealing with the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge in the interests of the nation. That right was successfully asserted in 1854, when a Commission for each University swept away a mass of obsolete statutes and restrictions, and relieved Universities from preponderating ecclesiastical influences by bringing the teaching under legitimate academical management. The right of Parliament was again asserted in 1869, when tests were abolished and emoluments were opened to all citizens, irrespective of their religious belief. The right of interference with Oxford and Cambridge depends upon their being national institutions, and not mere private corporations. With what object is this Bill now brought under our attention? Certainly not with the limited view of benefiting Oxford and Cambridge alone, but of benefiting the nation at large through the rich stores of intellectual wealth in which every citizen is or ought to be a partner. The Colleges and the University may have certain interests which are different; but they have the common object of promoting education; and in spite of some remarks from the hon. Member for the University of Cambridge (Mr. Beresford Hope), few persons will now maintain that Parliament has no right to exercise a vigilant supervision in order to ensure that the endowments are productively applied to their educational uses. At all events, the Bill proceeds on this assumption, by giving the Commissioners large powers to deal with College funds for educational objects. In one word, then, the Bill assumes that Oxford and Cambridge are great national institutions with national ends. The object of the Bill is to give them greater breadth, and to bring them into a better harmony with national wants. The Bill indicates these wants, on the whole, in a comprehensive way in the 16th clause, but only by indication and not by legislation. We do not legislate, but hand over our powers of legislation to certain Commissioners, who are not common to both Universities, but special to each. Nevertheless, each Commission might have a truly national character, representative alike of the peculiarities of the two Universities, and of the interests of learning and science, which are cosmopolitan, and are limited by no accidents of locality or training. The present Government knows quite well how such national Commissions should be constituted. They have recently appointed one for the reform of the four Scotch Universities—not one for each University, as this Bill provides. The Commission for Scotch learning and science was issued by the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary, and how did he constitute it? It now consists of 11 Commissioners, of whom, I believe, no fewer than five are graduates of Oxford and Cambridge, only four were trained exclusively in the Scotch Universities, one is a graduate of a German University, and one is without University training. Not a single murmur as to the national character of this Commission has ever been heard in Scotland. We rejoice that we have the experience of so many English graduates to help us in our reforms. We have found the experience of the German graduate of use, and the freedom from University tradition of the distinguished Commissioner who never had University training is of infinite value to us, because he looks at the questions in a purely national point of view. This large and comprehensive constitution of a University Commission is the work of the present Government, and it has therefore no excuse that it is ignorant in what spirit a scheme of University reform should be undertaken for the benefit of a nation. Unfortunately, the Home Secretary is not responsible for this Bill, for the Chancellor of Oxford University (Lord Salisbury) took charge of it last year in "another place," and the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Oxford University (Mr. Hardy) takes charge of it now, though they do not choose to remember that the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge are great national institutions, but they treat them as close corporations with mere local habits and peculiarities. Had there been even an infusion of Oxford graduates into the Cambridge Commission, and of Cambridge graduates into the Oxford Commission, we should at least have had the benefit of the excellencies peculiar to the one University being extended to the other. Last year there was one instance of this kind, when Sir Henry Maine, a Cambridge graduate, was put on the Oxford Commission. Why is he struck out now? Sir Henry Maine, by his writings when Chancellor of the University of Calcutta, has shown a large knowledge of University reform, and his services to a Commission would have been of great value; but I presume because he injured the close character of the Commissions now confined to the graduates of each University, he has been omitted in the Bill of this year. I do not intend to criticise the names of these Commissions, because I have neither the knowledge, nor inclination to do so. But, with the single exception of the hon. Member for North Northumberland (Mr. Ridley), they were men who graduated under the old system previous to 1854, when the Universities started into new life. If their University experience be worth much, those of them who have not lived in academic functions within the University must have an antiquated experience, of little value to guide the vigorous movements for reform which now characterise both Universities. This exclusive construction of the Commissions is to my mind a serious blot in the Bill, and I trust the Government will not deem us unreasonable if, from this side of the House, we propose the addition of one or two names representing the interests of science and of learning, without caring to what Universities they may belong. I should prefer, however, to see a Scotch and an Irish graduate on each Commission; for the interests of Scotch and Irish Universities are intimately connected with the prosperity of our great English Universities. From Scotland especially we send both to Oxford and Cambridge a constant stream of students, and the honour-lists of both Universities show that they are not unworthy additions. This is not a new practice, for it has existed for centuries; and, so far from feeling a jealousy of the richly-endowed English Universities, the Scotch Universities encourage their best students in arts to proceed to them, because we know that the Colleges and endowments enable the learning to be carried further than it is our function to impart, for our object is to infuse culture into the professions and industries of the people, and not to carry culture to a high position for itself alone. That undoubtedly is the highest and most unselfish idea of education, but is one which can only be the lot of the wealthy classes, or of the poor when they are made partners in rich endowments. Why, then, when the whole Kingdom glories in the success and even in the characteristics of the great English Universities, do you not make the nation at large a party to their reform, by constituting the Commissions so as to be representative of national interests, and not merely of the local peculiarities of Oxford and Cambridge? It would be presumptuous in me, at the second reading, to suggest to the Government the names of persons who might be added with advantage, but perhaps I may indicate offices which are representative. The Oxford Commission has two men distinguished in physical science—Mr. Justice

Grove and Professor Smith; and Cambridge has one in the person of Professor Stokes. But science is divided into two great sections, physical and biological, and there is not a single man versed in biological science on either Commission. It so happens that the President of the Royal Society, Dr. Hooker, is a naturalist and a Scotch graduate; and that the President of the Linnean Society is a distinguished zoologist—Dr. Allman, a graduate of Trinity College, Dublin. The addition of such names would gratify Scotland and Ireland, and materially improve the composition of the Commissions. The Commissions of 1877 differ from those of 1854, because the functions of the latter were chiefly to remove existing obstructions, and allow academic influences free play; while the present Commissions are largely creative, and have to bring the two Universities into accord with the present development of learning and science. The more is the need for their national character. They are short lived, for they expire in 1880; but if they do their work badly and without a full knowledge of modern wants, they will leave an inheritance of mischief which cannot be remedied in our time. Our English Universities, proud of them as we may justly be, are still far from fulfilling the full functions of Universities. A University should fulfil three conditions—it should possess within itself a full representation of learning and science in its academic staff; it should widely diffuse these to the nation through its teachers; and it should widen the boundaries of learning by the researches of its Professors, Fellows, and graduates. Can we say with truth that, rich as both Universities are, they nearly fulfil these conditions? The Bill admits these three-fold functions in its 16th clause, but the application of them is left to Commissioners who cannot be considered catholic representatives of the full conditions of University life. Our object is that our Universities should become the home of learning and science, and that they should receive new developments; but we know that the present system limits the capacity of the home and stunts the developments, and yet we appoint Commissioners wedded to the old system, and none having experience of other systems. Universities which do not in the broadest sense magnify their functions by trying to advance the boundaries of science, as well as to teach it, cease before long to become centres of intellectual activity. The unpopularity of the cry for the endowment of Research has chiefly arisen from the contemplated separation of this important duty of all Universities from the primary function of teaching. The latter, however, is best fulfilled by teachers who are themselves learners in science, so that they may infuse freshness into the subjects taught. But a teacher is a learner only when he is exploring new truths of science, and it is by the example of this combination between the teachers and the investigators that students are induced and stimulated to advance the boundaries of science. My experience, both in foreign and home Universities, has been that the best investigators are the best teachers, and that the union of a spirit of investigation with a spirit of instruction is always found where University life is most vigorous. We heard a good deal last year from the Government itself of the endowment of Research, but have heard little to-day. Though it was imprudently advocated as separate from the primary teaching functions of a University, do not now let us start the Commissioners with the belief that the House is indifferent to the duties imposed upon our great English Universities of advancing the boundaries of learning, as well as of teaching anciently-ascertained facts. I spoke at such length last year that I do not intend to detain the House longer. I would simply remark, in conclusion, that I hope I understand rightly the effect of the 51st and 52nd clauses of the Bill. Their purpose, as I take it, is to leave the University and College free to alter statutes and make new ones after the Commission ceases in 1880. These provisions are very important. I confess if the Bill simply gave to the Universities new powers and removed disabilities, I would have much more confidence in the academic influences now at work within the Universities to effect salutary reforms than I have in the powers to be exercised by Commissioners under this Bill. For the Universities show active efforts to adapt themselves to new wants. The opening up of new but restricted courses of studies, which enable men to devote themselves to the special subjects for which they are most suited; the system of unattached students, on the Scotch system, by which men with moderate means can study and acquire habits of economy and independence; the inter-Collegiate system of lectures, which increases the educational resources of the several Colleges and engrafts Professorial on tutorial methods; and the erection of new laboratories and museums, all indicate an internal spirit of reform which I trust the Commissioners will endeavour to foster by strengthening the academic influences now in full play, and without producing any fixity of system by statutes of too rigid a character.

MR. GREGORY said, that as the Bill was brought in by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of Oxford (Mr. Hardy), and was supported by the remaining Members for the English Universities, they might therefore take it for granted that it was acceptable to those Universities. At the same time it was, he thought, most desirable that every care should be taken, having regard to the views which had been expressed, to guard the interests of the Colleges. It was possible that some portion of the revenues of the Colleges should be applied to University purposes, but the Colleges were doing excellent work. The Collegiate system was conducive to the welfare of students and to their advancement in life, and he ventured to suggest that some limitation should be placed on the power of the Commissioners in dealing with the revenues of the Colleges, and intended to propose an Amendment dealing with the subject when the new clauses came to be considered. Some rule should be laid down under which, while the Commissioners should have sufficient powers to take such portion of the College revenues as was necessary for University purposes, they should not have those revenues placed absolutely at their disposal. At the same time he did not object to a moderate contribution from each of the Colleges, which he thought would be sufficient for any object which they could fairly be called upon to perform. Another defect of the present University system was the length of residence required from the undergraduates. At present no undergraduate could take a degree without residing for nine Terms, which involved a residence of three years in the University. When he was at the University, young men frequently came there from the public schools who were perfectly competent to go in for any examination. After passing their first examination with credit, they had two years before them during which they were called upon for no serious exertion. This second year was accordingly devoted to pursuits unconnected with University studies, and by the end of the third year he was demoralized. A young man seldom went to the University under 18 or 19 years of age, and as residence for three years was required, he was 22 or 23 years of age before he could enter upon the real business of life. He did not see why, if a young man was fit to take a degree at the end of his second year, he should not be allowed to do so, and should propose a provision in Committee to that effect. He thought it desirable young men should go to the University for two years, because a residence there was useful both in regard to their habits and connections. He had found, however, in his own profession that a young man required to be specially trained for his calling after he had gone through a general University training.

SIR JOHN LUBBOCK said, that having served on a Commission appointed to report on some of the subjects with which the Bill dealt, he might, perhaps, ask the indulgence of the House for a few minutes. The Preamble of the Bill expressed views very generally entertained in both Universities. It would certainly be desirable that the Colleges should contribute more largely out of their revenues for University purposes; and he quite believed that under any general system the great majority of Colleges would be ready and even anxious to do so. There might, however, be some exceptions, and there might well be considerable differences of opinion as to the amount which individual Colleges should contribute and the principle on which those amounts should be assessed. This amount would, however, be determined for each College by the seven Commissioners and the three Delegates elected by the College. Of course, if the seven Commissioners were all present and all agreed, they could outvote the Delegates; but, on the other hand, if there were differences of opinion among the seven Commissioners, the introduction of three Delegates, constituting so large an element, might result in different Colleges being very differently treated. In other respects, he did not object to the powers given to the Commissioners, because anything they might propose to do would have to come before Parliament, so that the House would have an opportunity of making objections if necessary, and the Commissioners would therefore not have such unlimited powers as some hon. Members appeared to assume. Clause 27 preserved the right of nominating or appointing to the Headship of St. Mary Magdalene College, in Cambridge, unless the consent by deed of the person entitled to that right was first obtained. Whether this was desirable or not, it was scarcely consistent with the previous clause, which expressly authorized the Commissioners to modify the trusts of the Dixie Foundation as regarded any right of nomination vested in the heir of the founder, and to commute that right in such a manner or make such other arrangement touching that right as to the Commissioners might seem just and beneficial, only providing that they should give notice, in writing, to the heir of Sir Wolstan Dixie. Now, surely some reason should be given why these two cases, apparently, at least, so similar, should be so differently dealt with. The object of this Bill, as stated in the Preamble, was the encouragement of science and other branches of learning, where the same were not taught, or were not adequately taught, in the University. He therefore trusted that the Government would carefully weigh some of the suggestions which had been offered by the hon. and right hon. Gentlemen, the Member for the Elgin Burghs (Mr. Grant Duff) and the Member for the Edinburgh and St. Andrew's Universities (Mr. Lyon Playfair). It was highly desirable, not only in the opinion of men of science, but in that of those eminent in other branches, that those who went up for their degree should have some knowledge of science; but whatever arrangements might be made that science should be taught in the Universities, it would never be learnt until more weight was attached to it in the distribution of Fellowships and in the system of examinations. There were over 700 Fellowships at Oxford and Cambridge, but according to the last Returns only 12 had been given for natural science. As regarded the examinations, if we except the requirements at Cambridge of elementary mechanics, nothing was done at any part of the course in either University to exact from the students generally any knowledge, however small, of even the elements of the sciences of experiment and observation. The Royal Commission, so ably presided over by the Duke of Devonshire, called special attention to this point, and expressed their unanimous opinion that while some literary cultivation ought to be expected from the scientific student, in like manner evidence of corresponding culture should be required from the student of classical literature and theology, and that "no one should receive a degree who was not grounded in science as well as in languages and mathematics," though such knowledge need not exceed that which might be easily acquired before coming up to the University. No one, indeed, would suggest that ignorance of science should exclude anyone from entrance to the Universities; against any such misconception the Duke of Devonshire's Commission took care to guard themselves, their suggestion being that in such a case there should be an obligation to pass an equivalent examination at some subsequent period of the University course. Very high classical authorities themselves gave strong evidence in support of the view—the Regius Professor of Greek, for instance, said he would require from everyone a certain amount of science before he took his degree. No one would wish that our Universities should become technical schools; but considering the nature of things, the importance of training the powers of observation, and the utility, he might almost say necessity, of French and German, he could not but wish that some acquaintance with modern languages and science should be required in the examinations for degrees. No doubt the Universities possessed even now laboratories and apparatus, libraries and museums. They had excellent Professors and admirable lectures, and the proportion of science Fellowships had been increased. But how were the lectures attended? The Camden Professor had an average attendance of six; the Professor of Moral Philosophy of five or six; the Professor of Botany three or four; of Mineralogy four or five; of Geology very few, and those principally ladies. The hon. Baronet the

Sir John Lubbock

Member for Chelsea (Sir Charles Dilke) was in favour of abolishing these lectures. Surely it would be wiser to render them more useful? The scientific lectures, however, would never be well attended as long as science was neglected in the distribution of Fellowships and ignored in the requirements for a degree. The effect of this was not only that the Universities did not encourage science in our system of education; more than this, they positively discouraged it. The Universities alleged that they did not offer Scholarships for natural science or require any science in the examinations for degrees, because they feared they would not get good candidates from the schools; and the schools did not teach natural science, because they were afraid of injuring the prospects of their pupils by diminishing their chances of obtaining a Scholarship, and taking a high degree. It could not be doubted that the effect upon the schools of this unequal distribution of rewards had been and was very discouraging to scientific study, and that it exerted an unfavourable influence upon the number of natural science students and on the general system of education in our great public schools. This was not a matter which could well be settled by Act of Parliament; nevertheless, when the Universities came to Parliament for legislation, it was open to us to urge on them the consideration of this important question. A degree ought to be something more than a mere certificate; it ought to imply that the possessor had enjoyed and profited by a good education; but a system under which all the sciences of observation were practically ignored could only be regarded as one-sided and incomplete.

MR. BALFOUR said, he had intended to have re-opened the burning question of "idle Fellowships," if it had not been for the state of the House and the turn the debate had taken. One of the arguments of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for London University (Mr. Lowe) was that you ought not to draw money from the Colleges, because the Colleges had done their duty and the Universities had not. That observation was made, he believed, chiefly in reference to Oxford, where, for anything he knew to the contrary, it might be true, but it was not true of Cambridge. One of the causes that kept the standard of examination there so low was that the University was, to a great degree, dependent for funds upon the men who passed its examinations, and the consequence was the authorities were influenced by that consideration of poverty which the right hon. Gentleman said ought not to be corrected.

Mr. GOSCHEN said, that the hon. Member for Cambridge University (Mr. Beresford Hope) spoke of the prospects of the Bill with alacrity, just as if it were going into Committee that evening. He (Mr. Goschen), however, thought the discussion had not been too long, considering the enormous interests at stake, and he assured the hon. Member that he did not share his views. The truth was they might debate the Bill as long as they liked in that House; they might state fully their views as to Fellowships, Professorships, and systems of education; they might speak of every question which was most important in connection with the Universities; but the fact remained that they had actually no power to determine anything on the subject. They might certainly endeavour to influence public opinion with respect to those matters; but otherwise all they could say in regard to them was scarcely to the purpose, because the Government handed over the settlement of the important questions which had been referred to during the debate to two Commissions. What did the Bill do? It stated that it was desirable to carry out certain objects of a very undefined character, and gave very extensive powers to the Commissioners to do certain things. They would even be able to abolish clerical Fellowships and to change the tenure of those Fellowships. That was a matter which, he believed, would be contested if it were brought to a vote by hon. Members opposite. For himself, however, he desired that that power should be exercised, and he trusted that some directions in accordance with it more positive than had been already given to the Commissioners would be given before the Bill passed into law. It was a matter of supreme importance; but he thought the hon. Member for Cambridge University had, to use a colloquial expression, let the cat out of the bag as regarded the Conservative view of the Bill. That policy was—"Agree with thine adversary quickly, whiles thou art in the way with him," and accordingly it was intended to settle every question of University Reform in advance while the Conservatives had the majority, and while the Members of the Privy Council, to whom the measure would be referred, were Members of the Conservative Party. ["No, no!"] To say the least, it was a curious coincidence, too, that the Government had also shortened the time for the operation of the Commission in reference to this debate from 1883 to 1881, on which date this Parliament would terminate. Therefore, the question of University Reform was to be settled by a Commission composed of men who commanded the full confidence of the hon. Member for Cambridge University, and who were to settle for some time the disposition of the £900,000 which constituted the revenues of the national Universities. It was of no use debating questions which would have to be settled by the Commission, and they could only hope that they might be settled satisfactorily. Many very important matters might depend upon the vote of a single Commissioner; and therefore it was very much to the purpose, seeing that the Commissioners were to decide almost every question by themselves, except such as hon. Members of the House were able to bring before Parliament, that they should do all they could to support the Government in strengthening the Commission, and in making it deserving of the support of the public, for it was of no use, as he had indicated, discussing what he might call the greater questions of principle connected with the Universities. The Government had justly been congratulated on the improvement in the Commission since last year; and, for his own part, he wished to endorse everything said by the hon. Member for the Elgin Burghs (Mr. Grant Duff) in that respect as merited. No words could be too strong as to the propriety of the selection of Professor Henry Smith; and as the suggestion had originally come from that side of the House—he believed from his noble Friend the Member for Calne (Lord Edmond Fitzmaurice)—it showed that after all there was some use in the struggles of a minority. They last year took up the attitude that it would be difficult to pass this Bill unless the Commission were improved, and he thought they might congratulate themselves that they did not allow it to be hurried through, for the Universities and the public would reap considerable advantages from their action. It had been suggested by his right hon. Friend the Member for the University of Edinburgh (Mr. Lyon Playfair) that a more national character should be given to these Commissions by adding to them representatives who were not graduates of Oxford and Cambridge; and, looking at the fact that they claimed them as national institutions, the plea was a very strong plea, and he trusted it would receive a very favourable reception from the Treasury Bench, and that the hon. Member for Cambridge University would not withdraw his approval of the Commissioners. Another particularly important point, and one which would be required to be watched in the progress of this measure, was, what control would Parliament have over the scheme for reform before it was finally adopted? It was one of the provisions of the Bill that each College should propose its own scheme of reform; but he had not been able to see either in the Bill of last year or in the Bill of this year how any general comprehensive plan could be formed if each College were able to hand in its own plan. He should have thought that what would have been necessary would have been that the Commissioners should first have ascertained what were the wants of the University, and then, having ascertained these, what would be the most equitable distribution of the available funds upon the basis of these wants. Then there was a clause in the Bill that the schemes of the Colleges should be submitted to Parliament; but, how could Parliament exercise any control over the scheme as a whole? Hon. Members must be exceedingly watchful in Committee, so as to prevent any final decision being arrived at without its being first submitted to Parliament. Another danger to which hon. Members should direct their attention was that if the Commission sat for three or four years, it was possible that one of the Members might resign, and the Commission might appoint a successor. Now the Chairman had two votes, and supposing, for some reason or other, Lord Selborne were to resign before the Commission had concluded their labours, there was nothing to hinder Earl Redesdale being substituted, in whom they could not have the same confidence. The Commission would continue their functions, but where, again, was the Parliamentary control? He thought that, on the whole, both sides of the House and the public outside had been led too much away by one feature in the Bill—namely, the application of College money to University purposes; but there were other points which were most important. He would call the attention of the public to the fact that under many of the powers given to the Commissioners the most sweeping changes could be made both at Oxford and Cambridge—changes which might revolutionize entirely the government of the Colleges. Enormous powers were given to create College offices, and those offices would not have to be given away as Fellowships were, by open competition, but they might be determined by the principle of nomination, so that Colleges might be governed by a number of chaplains, sub-chaplains, and assistant-chaplains, which might neutralize, to a certain extent, the University Tests Act, and give a decided Party colour to certain Colleges. That was a proposal to which they must look with watchfulness, and, perhaps, with some anxiety. He also asked hon. Members of the House to look to that clause of the Bill which disfranchised the young Fellows. He trusted that amongst the concessions which those on his side of the House might be able to induce the Government to make during the progress of the measure, it would be found that the clause in question would not be adhered to; but that every Fellow who was a member of the College would be allowed to exercise his franchise, and to assist in giving life and variety to the government of the institution. In conclusion, he hoped ample time would be given for the discussion of its various clauses, considering the great interests which were at stake.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he did not think the shortness of the debate argued any want of interest in the subject, and he felt quite sure that if it had been thought desirable by those hon. Gentlemen who took an interest in the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge that there should have been a wider discussion at this stage of the measure, that there would have been every disposition on the part of the Government to have met them, and there might have been a full, and, doubtless, interesting, discussion on the whole principles of University education. But what would really be the wisest course in this case would be to discuss the Bill very carefully in Committee. They had plenty of the Session before them, and there would be ample time for the full discussion of those interesting questions with which the Bill would be found to deal. As the Government were not anxious to press forward the going into Committee, hon. Members would have full time to consider the measure and the Amendments they would wish to introduce. He hoped those Amendments would be put on the Paper, so as to give ample time for their consideration. With regard to the general question, almost the only speech which could be treated as a speech against the principle of the measure was that of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of London (Mr. Lowe). The right hon. Gentleman held that a different course ought to have been adopted, and that, instead of bringing forward a Bill, the Government ought rather to have appointed a Royal Commission of a sufficiently extensive character which would have gone into the whole circumstances of the Universities, and should have waited the Report of the Commission before proposing legislation; and the right hon. Gentleman fortified his arguments partly by precedent, and partly by general observations. But that objection was answered by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of Oxford (Mr. Mowbray); and it should be further remembered that things were very different now from what they were in 1854, when, for the first time, the whole question of the Universities was opened up. Since that time 23 years had elapsed, and during those 23 years the attention of the public had been continually directed to the condition of the Universities. We had had a Commission such as that to which the hon. Baronet the Member for Maidstone (Sir John Lubbock) drew attention, and of which he was so distinguished a Member. That Commission recommended that education should be forwarded in this way and in that, and particularly in a scientific direction. Coincident with that, we had the Commission appointed by his right hon.

Friend opposite, which had been inquiring into the revenues of the Universities. The result of those Commissions was that the country had come to the conclusion that more might be done by the Universities for the promotion of learning and science, and also that there was a great deal of waste power in them which might be turned to better account for the purposes suggested. We should be losing valuable time, therefore, for purposes of education if we were to throw any more away in inquiries, not absolutely necessary, and, perhaps, not necessary at all. The object was to get on as fast as we could to supply wants to which attention had been called, and to bring the resources of the Universities into such a condition that we could make the most of them. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of Edinburgh (Mr. Lyon Playfair) wished to enlarge the scope of the whole matter, and to treat it as a large question of education. No doubt, that might be a very important and beneficial object; but the point to which they were now directing their attention was what better use could be made of the two Universities of Oxford and Cambridge? Attention had been called to the fact that the resources of the Universities might be turned to better account, and the Government were desirous that the task should be performed as far as possible by the Universities themselves. The task was one of a domestic character, the object being, as he had said, to turn the resources of the Universities to the best possible advantage, and he, therefore, contended that the Government had taken the proper course in laying down that the main principle of the Bill should be to induce the Colleges to improve themselves. No doubt, when they came to inquire into its clauses and details there would be found many points on which it would be desirable to have full discussion, and he would, therefore, repeat what he said at the beginning, that he hoped hon. Members would at once frame those Amendments to which they desired attention to be called when the House should be in Committee. In so doing, they would do well.

MR. SPENCER WALPOLE said, he wished to make two important corrections in the remarks of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the City of London (Mr. Goschen). The right hon. Gentleman had stated first, that the Executive power of the Commission was so extensive as to enable it to do almost anything; and secondly, that the only control over its acts would be that of a Committee of the Privy Council, which Committee would be constituted in such a manner that, in point of fact, it would be a political body. The fact, however, was the Executive control of the Commission which was appointed by the present Bill was a totally different control from that conferred upon the Commission by the prior Act of Parliament. In the former case there was no appeal from the Commission, but from this there was an appeal which Colleges or Universities or other parties interested might make to the Privy Council, and it was a matter of the utmost importance that the constitution of the Committee to which the appeal lay should not be misunderstood. Under the former Act, when the schemes were laid on the Table, on Motion made in that House, they were sent to the Privy Council, and the Members of the Council to determine the case were appointed by the Ministry of the day. In this Bill, however, the promoters had purposely put in the Members of the Council who were to determine the question in order that they might not be taken haphazard, and that the public might have the more confidence in them. The right hon. Gentleman would find that the Committee was composed of seven members. Two of those were unquestionably persons who held, in a sense, political offices—the Lord President of the Council and the Lord Chancellor—but they were also offices of an independent and judicial character; and he (Mr. Walpole) thought it was an equal chance whether those two would not be filled, when this part of the Act should come into operation, by Members sitting on either side of the House. The third Member was the Archbishop of Canterbury, who rather belonged to the Party on the opposite side of the House than to the Party on that (the Ministerial) side. The other Members were the Chancellors of the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge, one of whom was a Conservative and the other a Liberal, whilst the two remaining Members were to be appointed by the Crown, and one of them, at all events, was to be a Member of the Judicial Committee.

Mr. Spencer Walpole

He hoped the right hon. Gentleman, the Universities and the public, would therefore see that the ultimate tribunal to determine these appeals would be an independent tribunal, and could be fully trusted to do fair and ample justice between all those who were or might be interested in the questions which would have to be brought before it.

Question put, and agreed to.

SUPREME COURT OF JUDICATURE (IRELAND) BILL—[BILL 66.]

(Mr. Solicitor General for Ireland, Sir Michael Hicks-Beach.)

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Solicitor General for Ireland.)

MR. SERJEANT SHERLOCK thanked the Government for having introduced this measure so early in the Session. The Bill was an excellent one so far as it was drawn upon the lines of the English Act, and it would be highly beneficial that the same system of judicature, the same principles, and the same practice should be established in both countries. Under these circumstances, he was prepared to afford all the assistance in his power in carrying out the measure, as he believed that it would be advantageous to Ireland. The reduction which it was proposed to effect in the number of the Irish Judges appeared to be in accordance with the opinion which had been expressed by the Press and the public in Ireland; and, taking into consideration the amount of judicial business in that country he was far from opposing them; and, although he believed that there was some misapprehension on the point, he did not feel disposed to endeavour to stem the tide of public opinion. He might, however, mention that two of the Courts of Common Law in Ireland were fully occupied with business, and that in the Court of Exchequer there were very large arrears of new trial motions undisposed of. There was, however, one change proposed to be made in the Judicial Bench which he confessed he did not exactly understand—and that was the one which was to be made in the position of the Master of the Rolls. The Bill was professedly based on the English Act, but it did not follow that Act as regarded that learned Judge. In England he retained the full dignity and position of his ancient office, but it was not the case in Ireland. There the present Master of the Rolls, who had been a distinguished Member of the Common Law as well as of the Equity Bar, notwithstanding his eminence, would not form a Member of the Court of Appeal, and although he would personally retain his precedence so long as he lived, his successors would lose it, and rank after many Judges of whom the Master of the Rolls now took precedence, including the Lord Chief Justice of the Common Pleas, the Lord Chief Baron, and the Lords Justices of Appeal, and they would find their salaries diminished by £500 a-year. He must say that he did not think it good policy thus to degrade an ancient office, and he trusted that the Government would re-consider this matter. There was another point in the Bill to which he entertained great objection. The pressure of business in England had rendered it absolutely essential in order to relieve the over-weighted Judge to appoint official referees to whom causes might be referred. But this was at least an unsatisfactory measure, depriving suitors as it did of the opportunity of submitting their causes to a Judge of the Superior Court. It ought not to be resorted to except in the case of extreme necessity. But this necessity did not exist in Ireland. There was no pressure of business upon the Judges there to excuse it, and he did not think it was, therefore, desirable to add thereto the facilities which already existed for the referring to arbitration all cases in which it was desirable that such a reference should be made. It was an innovation upon the old practice which had found no favour in England, and which, in his opinion, ought not to be applied to Ireland. By another provision of the Bill the Lord Chancellor in Ireland was to take matters exclusively of an appellate character; whereas it would be far better, in view of the small number of appeals in Ireland, if, when the Court of Appeal was unoccupied, that learned Judge were enabled to sit as a Judge of First Instance. It might not be advisable to compel that high dignitary to sit as a Judge of First Instance, but he thought it going unnecessarily out of the way to prohibit him from doing so. The introduction of the new Winter Assizes would be productive of much good, because there were cases in which from the nature of the case prisoners could not be admitted to bail, and yet it might eventually turn out that they were quite innocent. It was, therefore, in every way desirable to accelerate their trial by special Commissions or by Winter Assizes. He regretted that the Bill did not embody within it, in the same way as the English Act, the rules of procedure by which the Supreme Court was to be governed in the future. It was deemed necessary that the rules under the English Act should be sanctioned by Parliament; whereas the Irish rules were to be framed by the Judges under the authority of the Lord Chancellor, and were then to be approved by the Lord Lieutenant in Council, which was scarcely the proper body to settle matters of that kind. There were some other minor matters requiring attention, which struck him in connection with the Bill; but he would not delay the House further, as they would have an opportunity of discussing details in Committee.

MR. LAW said, that before the Question as to the second reading was put he wished to offer a few observations on some of the more prominent features of this very important Irish measure, though he did not rise for the purpose of opposing it. On the contrary, he was very anxious to see it passed, as he thought that legislation upon the subject had been too long delayed. As to the contemplated reduction in the number of Judges, he doubted whether the extent or value of this reform was sufficiently understood. The Bill proposed either presently or prospectively to get rid of four of the Irish Judges, and also an important legal functionary called the Master Receiver, and thus to effect a saving of over £14,000 a-year in judicial salaries alone; and this by itself he thought was a very considerable measure of economy. He concurred in the remarks of his hon. and learned Friend who had just spoken as to official referees, and also as to the inexpediency of departing as the Bill proposed to do in respect of the Irish Court of Appeal from the course that had been adopted in the constitution of the Court of Appeal in England. It was a matter of paramount importance in Ireland, that they should have a strong Court of Appeal. They could not afford to come to Westminster except for the very heaviest and most important cases. That luxury they must leave to the more fortunate dwellers in Great Britain. For the satisfactory adjustment of their rights it was essential that they should have a tribunal of as great strength as they could supply in Ireland. He had never heard any reason stated why the Master of the Rolls in Ireland should not be an ex officio Member of the Court of Appeal, as the Master of the Rolls in England was. It might, perhaps, be said that the Master of the Rolls was too deeply engaged already with the business of his own Court; but he did not apprehend that the Master of the Rolls would have any unsuperable difficulty in contributing his knowledge and experience to the efficiency of the Court of Appeal. And, at all events, he would have no more difficulty than the Chief Justices or the Chief Baron. In fact, they knew that the Chief Judges of the Common Law Courts had other and onerous duties to perform besides sitting in Banco with their Colleagues, and the Master of the Rolls, he had no doubt, could also, occasionally, at least, find time to attend the Court of Appeal. He could understand the argument, if those who were for excluding the Master of the Rolls, were against having any ex officio Members of the Appellate Court. This, however, they felt they could not reasonably contend for. And as the necessary judicial strength must often be sought outside the ordinary Court of Appeal, he (Mr. Law) hoped the Master of the Rolls in Ireland, as in England, would be added to the list of Chief Judges who might be called in when necessary to constitute a Court of extra strength. He understood too there was another point on which this Bill differed from the English measure, and that was with respect to registration appeals. It appeared to him a questionable course to transfer appeals involving what he could not help calling political questions from a tribunal like the Court of Exchequer Chamber to one which would be presided over in all cases by the Lord Chancellor, who was to a certain extent a political officer.

Mr. Law

However, if cases of this kind were to be dealt with by the Court of Appeal it became all the more important that for that purpose as well as for disposing of the other difficult and delicate questions which would come before it—as, for example, under the Land Act of 1870—they should have a Court so constituted as to command the entire confidence of the country. With regard to the way in which the Bill dealt with the Judge of the Probate Court, he supposed it was the best course that could be adopted under the circumstances. He was of opinion that in this respect the Bill of last year was absurd, for although it declared that the Judge was to be transferred, he was not in fact transferred. He thought therefore that the Government had exercised a wise discretion in leaving out the Court of Probate altogether.

SIR COLMAN O'LOGHLEN said, he had great pleasure in offering his hearty congratulations to the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland on his first appearance in that House in his official character, for he was certain that his appointment had given satisfaction to every member of the Bar, and that it would be a matter of just pride and gratification to him if he succeeded in passing this Session a measure on that subject which had been twice before the House. The Bills introduced in 1875 and 1876 did not come on for discussion in this House till a late period of the Session, and the Bar of Ireland could not fairly be charged with endeavouring to obstruct the measure of last year. All they desired was that it should be fairly discussed, and if it had been brought forward in this House at an earlier period of the Session, instead of being brought down from "another place" so late as it was, it would in all probability have been passed. Though the present Bill differed in some material respects from that of last year, it was identical with it in principle. Almost all the reductions proposed last year were incorporated in this Bill, which substantially carried out the views expressed by Her Majesty's Government in the Judicature Bills of 1875 and 1876. The chief difference between the measure now under consideration and that of last year consisted in the mode of dealing with the Bankruptcy and Probate Courts. Last year a most extraordinary proposal was made to transfer the jurisdiction in Bankruptcy to the Court of Exchequer. He (Sir Colman O'Loughlen), however, opposed that proposal and suggested that, as the learned Judge of that Court had to go on circuit, the jurisdiction should be transferred instead to the Court of Chancery. Her Majesty's Government had not now adopted his view; but they had, perhaps properly, left the Bankruptcy Court altogether out of the Bill, a course that had received the support and approval of the barristers and solicitors of Dublin. He hoped that next year his right hon. and learned Friend would introduce a general Bankruptcy Bill, and that by it, above all things, local jurisdiction in Bankruptcy would be given to such large towns as Belfast and Cork, and ultimately that the Bankruptcy jurisdiction would be transferred to a Vice Chancellor in the Court of Chancery as in England. The other alterations made in the Bill were in reference to the Court of Probate. By the Bill of last Session it was proposed that the Court of Probate should be united with the Court of Common Pleas in Ireland; but the Judge of the former Court, though he would have received a higher salary, would not have been allowed to perform the ordinary duties of the Court to which he was to be transferred. This provision he was glad to find had now been altered. He thought, however, that when the office of Judge of the Court of Probate became vacant the jurisdiction of that Court ought to be transferred to the Court of Common Pleas. The whole of the Judges of Ireland had met and expressed an opinion that that ought to be done, and the Judges of the Common Pleas had notified their willingness to take this business. Another argument in favour of the proposal was, that there would be a saving of £3,500 per annum. With respect to the Landed Estates Court he did not like the proposals in the Bill as to the extension of its jurisdiction, though he thought the Government had done quite right in appointing a second Judge. The Landed Estates Court had been one of the best Courts established in Ireland; and if a similar tribunal, with power to give a Parliamentary title, were established in England it would be a great advantage to this country. [Sir GEORGE BOWYER: No, no!] Well, if his hon. Friend differed from him he could write a letter to The Times to-morrow morning on the subject. This Bill dealt with the salaries of the Judges. The salary of the Master of the Rolls was to be increased from £4,000 Irish to £4,000 British, but the difference between Irish and British was so small that he was surprised at such a proposal being made. In addition, the new Vice Chancellor was to have the same amount. Then the salary of the Judge of the Court of Probate and Matrimonial Causes was to be increased from £3,500 to £3,800, though why he could not understand. It was proposed by the Bill to do away with the Judge of the Admiralty Court. This he regarded as inconsistent with the 8th Article of the Act of Union; and it seemed to him that if any Court stood in need of a separate Judge it was the Court of Admiralty, seeing that its duties required peculiar knowledge which ordinary Judges did not possess. He thought, therefore, the office should be retained, but it might be expedient to make him also Wreck Commissioner under the Act of last Session, and to give him some jurisdiction over Probate and Matrimonial causes. There was a clause enabling the Judge in question to retire at once, but this seemed unnecessary, the gentleman who held the office being in the full vigour of life. With regard to salaries, it was proposed that no Judge appointed in future should have less than £3,500; but the salary of the Judges of the Landed Estates Court at present was £3,000, and surely it would be unfair to give those who had long been discharging the duties of the Bench a less salary than was given to a newly-appointed Judge. There was reason to fear, also, that under the provisions as they stood there might at times be a great delay in the appointment of a new Judge. As to the mode in which it was proposed to deal with the officers of the Court he thought it wrong that there should be a different system in Ireland from that in England, but this was a matter of detail, which could be discussed in Committee. With regard to making the Master of the Rolls a Judge of the Court of Appeal, he contended that it was unwise to place Judges of Primary Courts on the Bench of the Appellate Court; and he believed the opinion entertained in the Profession in England with reference to the double duties cast upon the Master of the Rolls was not at all favourable to the plan. He hoped the Committee on the Bill would not be taken till after Easter. If it was taken earlier there would be much inconvenience caused to some Irish Members, and a sense of injustice would be the result. This would be particularly regrettable in connection with so important a Bill, to which the Irish Members generally offered no opposition except on some points of detail.

MR. CHARLES LEWIS thought the right hon. and learned Baronet opposite (Sir Colman O'Loughlen) somewhat contradictory in his complaints, for he had talked of the Bill of last year as introduced too late, and of the present one as introduced too early. Seeing that an hon. Member had set down a Motion for the rejection of the measure, it might be well for the Government to follow their own counsel as to when they should take the Committee, and not listen to the counsel of hon. Gentlemen opposite. He must express his astonishment at the allusion made by the right hon. and learned Baronet to the Act of Union. It was not unusual to hear appeals made to the Act of Union in opposition to proposed changes, but there was rarely such extreme veneration shown for it as the right hon. and learned Baronet had just manifested, when he sought its aid, not for the purpose of preserving some great public institution, nor for some great public necessity, but for preserving the dignity or increasing the salary of an Admiralty Judge. He (Mr. Lewis) trusted the Act of Union would not stand in the way of Her Majesty's Government doing the very best for the Irish system of Judicature without reference to an Admiralty Judge, his office, or his salary. There was one point on which he agreed with the right hon. and learned Baronet, and that was with reference to having local Bankruptcy Judges in Ireland. It was a most remarkable thing that there was a local Bankruptcy jurisdiction over the whole of England; but in the city which he had the honour to represent persons had to travel to Dublin in order to transact their Bankruptcy business. If a person in Londonderry failed in business he went to Dublin, and was there made a bankrupt, and his creditors had to travel 200 miles, having to follow him at their own expense to obtain justice. That was the system which prevailed at the present time in Ireland, whilst in England a totally different system prevailed. In fact, the English system was directly opposite. The English system first began by the appointment of Bankruptcy Commissioners in Leeds, Manchester, Birmingham, Hull, Liverpool, and nearly all large towns, and now there was, through the County Courts, a local Bankruptcy jurisdiction all over England and Wales. Many of the statements made by hon. Gentlemen opposite with reference to the want of consideration by the House of Irish Business were exaggerated or untrue. ["No, no!"] Well, at least, he thought so. But he had put Questions in that House to the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland with respect to this matter during the last two or three years. Promises had been made that the subject should receive careful attention; but, notwithstanding those promises, nothing had as yet been done. He should not be surprised if he heard his right hon. Friend who so ably represented the Government, say that the subject should receive his most careful attention, and on a future day would be included in a general Bankruptcy Bill for Ireland. But even if the right hon. Gentleman made that promise, it was only what he had been told three or four years ago. As no attempt had been made to redeem these promises he had mentioned the subject again that evening.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. Gibson), said he had no doubt, from its reception by the House, that the Bill would be allowed to pass. The course of debate, from beginning to end, upon the Bill had been anything but unsatisfactory, and he thought it might be gathered from the discussion, which had been carried on in the fairest way on both sides, that the House approved the general principle of the Bill, which was to assimilate as rapidly as possible the judicial system in Ireland to that prevailing in England. Two important changes were contained in this Bill as compared with previous measures introduced on the same subject. One was the omission of the attempt to put the Court of Probate into the Court of Common Pleas; the other was the omission of a similar attempt to introduce the Bankruptcy Court into the Court of Exchequer. Those were the only broad changes which had been made in the Bill, and he gathered that they were acceptable to the House, as no objection had been raised to them. With regard to the opinion which had been expressed by the right hon. and learned Baronet the Member for Clare (Sir Colman O'Loughlen) and the hon. Member who had just sat down (Mr. Charles Lewis) in favour of the introduction of some legislation with respect to the establishment of local jurisdiction in Bankruptcy in Ireland, he (Mr. Gibson) would only say that the present Bill carefully excluded anything in regard to Bankruptcy. In fact the measure need not have referred to the Court of Bankruptcy at all, but for the circumstances that it provided for the Court of Bankruptcy a Court to which its appeals should go as a Court of Appeal, instead of the Court of Appeal, which was abolished by the Bill. He therefore thought it was hardly possible that he could accept the wording of any Amendments which might be placed upon the Notice Paper dealing with the question raised by the hon. Members for Clare and Londonderry. His hon. Friend who sat behind him (Mr. Charles Lewis) did not seem to attach very much importance to the pledge of the Government, that they would give the subject their attention, and therefore it was with considerable hesitation that he ventured to tell the hon. Gentleman again, that the remarks which he had made upon the subject should receive the earliest possible consideration of the Government. With regard to the other criticisms which had been urged by hon. Gentlemen, he hoped he should be excused if he did not go into them at great length. In reference to what had been said about the omission of the name of the Master of the Rolls from the list of Judges of the new Court of Appeal in Ireland, he ventured to say that it was done advisedly, in consideration of the state of business prevailing in the Court of that most eminent Judge. No one could entertain a higher opinion of that most distinguished Judge than he did. He was acquainted with the public opinion in Ireland, and he was also acquainted with the public opinion in his own Profession, and the idea of suggesting that there had been the slightest intention of casting a slight on that distinguished man by omitting his name from the list of Judges for the new Court of Appeal was so unfounded that it was a subject which he did not think it necessary to advert to. The Government had before them the experience of England, and he was not sure that it had worked so admirably well in England. The Master of the Rolls in England had a great deal to do in his own Court, and it was only by working very hard, and very possibly by overworking himself very much, that he was able to make it possible to occasionally attend at the Court of Appeal. He might say that of all the Irish Bench, none of them were harder worked than the Master of the Rolls. The Master of the Rolls had very laborious work, and also very arduous Chamber sittings, and he ventured to say that if they were to ask the Master of the Rolls the same thing, he would say—"Save me from my friends! I have quite enough to do, and more than enough, without being cast into a new office." The hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for King's County (Mr. Serjeant Sherlock) adverted to another topic, and stated that he was sorry that the clauses with reference to referees were not omitted. He (Mr. Gibson) thought his hon. and learned Colleague, in introducing the Bill, pointed out what he now ventured to call attention to—namely, that the compulsory clauses of the Bill of last Session, compelling the public to refer their cases to referees, had been omitted from the Bill, and that the referees would only act where all the parties not labouring under any incapacity consented. He thought that was a provision which would recommend itself to the better judgment of the House. Two or three of his hon. and learned Friends adverted to another topic, and rather suggested that it might be desirable to withdraw from the Court of Appeal constituted under this Act the power of hearing registration appeals. He thought it better, however, when one Court of Appeal was established, to let it decide everything. It would be a strong Court, and there could be no question of the strength of the Court proposed in the Bill. Indeed, it could hardly be gravely suggested that the Lord Chancellor of any Government, no matter what his politics, would be influenced in deciding a registration case. He was not sure that in connection with the Bill there were any other topics which it would be reasonable for him to refer to on the second reading. He could only say that the other questions raised would receive every possible attention on the part of the Government, and he hoped that the Bill would soon become law. As to what had been said by the right hon. and learned Baronet the Member for Clare with reference to fixing the Committee on the Bill, he was afraid he could not consent to defer it until after Easter, seeing that the Bill had now been before the House for three Sessions, and had been fully discussed. He would, however, endeavour to meet the convenience of all hon. Members interested in the question, but he should endeavour to take the Committee on the Bill before Easter. The Bill would effect a very great saving by the consolidation of offices and the consequent reduction in their number; and in doing so he trusted it would not only effect a substantial saving in the public funds, but that also greater facility in the administration of justice would be accomplished by it, and he therefore hoped it would now be read a second time.

CAPTAIN NOLAN pointed out that that would be an inconvenient time for Irish Members to attend on the Committee, and hoped that at least it would not be taken before Easter.

Question put, and agreed to.

(Sir Henry Selwin-Ibbetson, Mr. Assheton Cross.)

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. HOPWOOD said, he was glad that this measure had been introduced at so early a period of the Session. As to fees in criminal cases at petty sessions, he was sorry that the Government had not dealt with them; they ought to be entirely abolished. That those who came to seek justice, or were brought up to be dealt with by the law should be made to pay for it was a doubtful policy. Again, some precaution should be taken against the clerks being interested in matters brought before the justices. A clause might be introduced prohibiting this. Further, there was no power given to the justices to remit the fees.

The Attorney General for Ireland

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON said, that he thought that as regarded the question of fees in criminal cases at petty sessions, it was a subject which hardly formed a part of that Bill. As to the clerks of justices being interested in the cases heard, that would be difficult to deal with in rural districts, where the clerk was often the only person qualified to conduct the proceedings. However, he would remind the House that the Government had promised to deal generally with the question. As to remitting the fees, the most valuable provision of the Permissive Act was the power of remitting fees. In his opinion, the Bill would be a considerable addition and improvement to the existing law on the subject.

Bill read a second time, and committed for Thursday.

MOTION FOR A RETURN.

MR. JAMES moved for a Return of all Oaths or Declarations made by the Master, Assistants, Freeman, Clerk, or other Officer, on assumption of office in each of the eighty-nine Companies mentioned in the second Report of the Municipal Commissioners of 1837. As he was about to bring forward a Motion on the subject, he did not think that the Return he now asked for would be refused.

MR. ISAAC opposed the Motion, remarking that when the hon. Member made his statements with regard to the City companies, he should content himself by refuting them. The hon. Member might as well ask for a Return of the oaths administered to secret societies, such as Freemasons and the like.

MR. CHARLEY, regarding the Return demanded by the hon. Member opposite (Mr. James) as being inquisitorial, should support the hon. Member for Nottingham (Mr. Isaac) in his opposition to the Motion, and press it to a division, if necessary.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS thought that some reasons should be assigned in support of the Motion before it was granted.

MR. JAMES said, that he had before mentioned it was his intention to bring forward a Motion on the subject, and he thought it desirable that the House should be made acquainted with the oaths imposed on certain persons, who thereby became entitled to the electoral franchise. Certain oaths had been removed by the passing of the Test Acts, and there was no valid ground that such obsolete observances should be retained as accessory to any municipal rights. A Return similar to that for which he now asked was granted a few years ago. In answer to the hon. Member for Nottingham (Mr. Isaac), he might say that members of those societies he referred to did not exercise municipal privileges as was the case with the bodies mentioned in the Return.

MR. STEWART HARDY rose to Order. The hon. Member had already spoken in moving for the Return.

MR. SPEAKER ruled that the hon. Member was in Order.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, that on looking to the terms of the Motion, he did not see how the House could refuse this Return, which would not be opposed by Her Majesty's Government.

Motion made, and Question put,

"That there be laid before this House, a Return of all Oaths or Declarations made by the Master, Assistants, Freemen, Clerk, or other Officer, on assumption of office in each of the eighty-nine Companies mentioned in the Second Report of the Municipal Commissioners, 1837."—(Mr. James.)

The House divided:—Ayes 80; Noes 43: Majority 37.

Return ordered, "of all Oaths or Declarations made by the Master, Assistants, Freemen, Clerk, or other Officer, on assumption of office in each of the eighty-nine Companies mentioned in the Second Report of the Municipal Commissioners, 1837."—(Mr. James.)

CRUELTY TO ANIMALS.

MOTION FOR AN ADDRESS.

MR. MUNDELLA moved an Address for a Return of Licences granted under the Act to amend the Law relating to Cruelty to Animals, commonly known as the Vivisection Act.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying that She will be graciously pleased to give directions that there be laid before this House, a Return of Licences granted under the Act (39 and 40 Vic. c. 77) to 'amend the Law relating to Cruelty to Animals,' specifying,—

"1. The persons to whom such Licences have been granted since the Act came in force;

"2. The Licences in which the (optional) provision (Clause 7), requiring that the place wherein the experiment is performed shall be registered, has been inserted;

"3. The Certificates which have been received under Clause 3, permitting experiments as illustrations of lectures to students;

"4. The Certificates which have been received under Clause 5, permitting experiments on cats, dogs, horses, mules, or asses;

"5. The Certificates (special) which have been received for performing experiments without anæsthetics, and the number of such experiments in which curare has been employed;

"6. The scientific authorities who have in each case granted such Certificates."—(Mr. Mundella.)

MR. ASSHETON CROSS said, he had no objection to any Return that might be asked for to call into account the action of the Secretary of State in the administration either of this or of any other Act; but this was a matter of some delicacy that concerned not only the Secretary of State, but some of the highest scientific men in the country. He hoped therefore that his hon. Friend the Member for Sheffield (Mr. Mundella) would see that in the first instance, at all events, it would be sufficient if he received the Return in a somewhat altered form. If, when he got the Return so altered, his hon. Friend should still be of opinion that there was anything wrong that required further explanation, he should then move for a further Return. In the first instance, he (Mr. Cross) proposed that there should be an alteration in Number 1 of the Return, so that it should give the number of the persons and not the names of the persons themselves to whom the licences had been granted, and the names of all the places which had been registered under the Act. The same alteration would apply to Numbers 2, 3, 4, and 5, and with regard to the 6th, which he would not however insist upon, he thought it might be dispensed with altogether. He could assure the hon. Member that no licence had been given to any person, except upon the highest guarantee as to the nature of the experiments. When the hon. Member got the Return, he would see that this Act had been fairly and he, (Mr. Cross) hoped, wisely administered. As the question had now come before the House and the country, there might be some anxiety to know how far the Act was carried out. He was bound to say that the medical and scientific gentlemen concerned in the question had acted throughout with the greatest candour and fairness as far as the Secretary of State was concerned. They had met the Secretary of State in every possible way, and he was able to say at the present moment that with regard to the question referred to in Number 5 of the Return—namely, the instances in which experiments had been performed without anæsthetics, the number which had been certified amounted to 1. He believed he might say, so far as the Act was concerned, that since its passing no act calculated wantonly to cause pain had been inflicted. He hoped that when that fact became known, two facts would be seen—first, that the working of the Act had been carefully attended to; and, secondly, that the medical and scientific world were willing to join with the Parliament and with the Secretary of State, and, indeed, with the opinion of the country as far as was possible, in preventing the unnecessary infliction of pain upon dumb animals. This was a fact of the highest importance, which it was desirable that the House and the country should fully acknowledge. He might further remark that in the course they had taken the scientific and medical gentlemen of this country had set an example to all foreign countries. He hoped the hon. Member for Sheffield and the House would assent to the alteration in the form of the Motion which he had suggested.

MR. MUNDELLA said, he should be very happy, under the circumstances, to accept the suggestion of the right hon. Gentleman, although he should prefer to have had the Return in the form of which he had given Notice. He hoped the hon. Member who had given Notice of his intention to oppose the Motion (Dr. Ward) would now withdraw his opposition.

DR. WARD said, he was quite satisfied with a Return modified as the Home Secretary had proposed. It would be unobjectionable in that shape; but had it been granted in the form proposed by the hon. Member for Sheffield (Mr. Mundella) it would have been most inquisitorial and invidious, and by the disclosure of names would have subjected many persons to persecution at the hands of the anti-vivisectionists.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn:—Then

Address for—

“Return of Licences granted under the Act (39 and 40 Vic. c. 77) to ‘amend the Law relating to Cruelty to Animals,’ specifying,—

“2. The number of Licences in which the (optional) provision (Clause 7), requiring that the place wherein the experiment is performed shall be registered, has been inserted;

“3. The number of Certificates which have been received under Clause 3, permitting experiments as illustrations of lectures to students;

“4. The number of Certificates which have been received under Clause 5, permitting experiments on cats, dogs, horses, mules, or asses;

“5. The number of Certificates (special) which have been received for performing experiments without anæsthetics, and the number of such experiments in which curare has been employed;

“6. The scientific authorities who have in each case granted such Certificates,”—(Mr. Mundella,)

OBSERVATIONS. QUESTION.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL, who had given Notice of his intention

“To direct the attention of the House to the Instructions from Her Majesty's Government to the Marquess of Salisbury dated the 20th of November, 1876; and to ask Her Majesty's Government whether they intend to take any further measures for the attainment of the ends contemplated in those Instructions,” said:—My Lords, I rise to call the attention of your Lordships' House, in the first place, to the Instructions which were issued by Her Majesty's Government to the Marquess of Salisbury when he went out as their Special Envoy to Constantinople. Those Instructions had two great ends in view—the first was to obtain some security for internal reforms in Turkey, and the other was to obtain some security for the peace of Europe. My Lords, neither of those two great ends has been attained. There is no reform in Turkey, and alas! my Lords, there is no prospect of peace in Europe. As regards the condition of the subjects of Turkey, I do not exaggerate when I say that there never has been a time in this century when their condition was so alarming or so precarious, and as regards the peace of Europe, we have only to look at that dark background to that dark picture to see more than half a million of men in arms on the frontiers of European and Asiatic Turkey. My Lords, it is time that we should ask ourselves and the Government what have been the causes of this great failure. No doubt there are many causes, for this Eastern Question is a very old Question, having deep roots in the history of the past, and pointing to great changes in the history of the future; but I am much mistaken if two causes in particular cannot be pointed out—first, the unhappy policy which Her Majesty's Government pursued up to the end of last August; and, secondly, the half-heartedness, timidity, and vacillation with which they pursued the new policy which was imposed on them by the public feeling of the country after the Bulgarian massacres had been ascertained. These are the propositions which it will be my duty to substantiate in your Lordships' House to-night; and, my Lords, there is one great comfort in our position now, and that is that at last in the Instructions of the Government to Lord Salisbury—at last—we have a common ground which we did not possess before. If I had had to conduct this argument at the close of the last Session, I do not know where I should have begun. It is impossible to reason on any subject without some common ground to go upon. Where there are no common facts admitted, where there are no common principles recognised, where there are no common feelings sympathised in, it is impossible to come to any conclusion that can be satisfactory. But here for the first time we have an official document in which the main facts of the case are recognized, in which the main principles are admitted, and in which the feelings of the country, if they are not enthusiastically expressed, at least receive some degree of official recognition and respect. This is a great advance, and there are also other matters of great moment, even outside of these Instructions, on which we may find agreement. Allow me to refer for a moment to the significant observation which fell from the Prime Minister on the first night of the Session, when, in reply to some remarks of mine, he said I surely did not maintain or suppose that the interests of the Christian subjects of the Porte formed the only point to be considered in this great Eastern Question—that there were grave considerations of European policy involved, including the fate of Empires. I entirely agree with the noble Earl on that point. It is one of the misfortunes of a partial discussion on a great subject that one is very liable to be misunderstood. I must say that I feel the force and justice of the demands which are often made upon us who criticise the conduct of the Government, to declare our opinion on these great questions of policy to which the noble Earl adverted, and I feel its justice all the more when that demand is made to those who have had any share in the responsibility for the Crimean War. I think the noble Earl has a right to ask us, who were parties to that war and to the Treaties of 1856, whether we have fairly borne in mind that, whatever may be the case now, at the beginning of these transactions the Government were unquestionably bound by the Treaty of 1856. My Lords, I must say at once that they were so bound. I am not now entering into the question whether the refusal of the Turks at the Conference to concede the demands made by Europe has, or has not, released us from any of the obligations of that Treaty. I am simply admitting most fully that, at the beginning of those transactions, the Government were bound by the whole scope of the Treaties that existed, and that we, in criticising their conduct, are bound to recollect this great and important fact. More than that, I think the Government have a right to make another demand upon us, and to ask us whether we who were Members of Lord Aberdeen's Cabinet admit the policy which led to the Crimean War, and to the Treaties of 1856 and 1871. I do not mean to enter into the controversy about the policy of the Crimean War, or into the question as to whether a better diplomacy, or whether the presence of any other man at the head of the Government might or might not have averted that war. What I think the Government have a right to ask, and what we are bound to answer, is whether, on the whole, we think the general policy which was the object of the Crimean War, and to maintain which we were ultimately driven, perhaps unfortunately, into that war, whether we admit that that policy was a sound one, or whether we have retracted all our opinions on that subject, and retired altogether from the ground which we then occupied. My Lords, I have no right to speak for others, but speaking for myself, I may say that

I still regard the general policy which resulted in the Crimean War was a wise, a necessary, and a just policy. My Lords, what was that policy? It was simply and solely this—that the fate of Turkey, whatever that fate might be, was to be a matter for Europe, and not for Russia alone. That was the principle for which we contended, and for which we were ultimately compelled to fight. My Lords, I hold by that. We had a right to say that Russia should not be allowed to take steps by which she should serve herself exclusive heir to this great and splendid inheritance of the East. The fate of Turkey, whether Turkey be a sick man or a dying one, is a question for Europe, and not for Russia alone. So far as the Government have been influenced by that consideration, I think they were bound to stand by the Treaty of 1856, and by the general policy which was sanctioned at that time, and which has been acted upon by every successive Cabinet. I must further say that I am not one of those who think that the balance of power, as it is called—although many foolish and wicked things have been done in its name—I am not one of those who think that that doctrine is now no better than an old almanack, and that it is a matter of no moment to the rest of Europe whether Russia shall or shall not possess herself of territory from Siberia to the Dardanelles. Together with the other Powers of Europe, we have an interest in this matter—an interest less than theirs, indeed, but still sufficient to influence our course of action. My own views on this matter cannot be better expressed than in a very remarkable speech made by the noble Earl opposite (Earl Derby), which has been frequently quoted in the course of these discussions. I shall now quote it again—not for the purpose of convicting the noble Earl of inconsistency, but for the purpose of instructing those among his own friends who differ from him, I suspect, far more than I do, and for the purpose of sheltering myself behind his authority. The speeches of that noble Earl are very seldom made in a purely Party spirit, they are always more or less philosophical speeches, bearing the impress of careful thought and the calmest judgment; and much as I differ from his conduct in the course of these events, I hope it will not be thought that I fail to appreciate the many intellectual gifts which have won for him the confidence of a large portion of his countrymen. His views, as expressed in the speech I refer to, contain the true principles of the policy which ought to be pursued by England. The speech was delivered, I believe, at King's Lynn, and the noble Earl said—

"I confess I do not understand, except it may be from the influence of old diplomatic traditions, the determination of your older statesmen"—

By the bye, to whom did he refer as "older statesmen?" I believe my noble Friend has a very little the advantage of me in years, and I must "declare off" from that great army of old fogies to which he refers. He goes on—

"the determination of your older statesmen to stand by the Turkish rule. Whether right or wrong, I think we are making for ourselves enemies of races which will soon become in Eastern countries dominant there. I think we are keeping back that from which we, as the great traders of the world, would be the greatest gainers, and we are doing that for no earthly advantage, either present or prospective. I admit that England has an interest, and a very strong one, in the neutrality of Egypt, and some interest also, though to a less extent, in Constantinople not falling into the hands of another European Power; but, these two matters left aside, I cannot see any harm arising to England from any transfer of power."

My Lords, I entirely agree with this exposition of English policy—every word of which I, for one, am willing to adopt. But, my Lords, having admitted that the Government were bound by the Treaties, I would proceed to ask—to what do those Treaties bind us? I listened carefully to the speech of the noble Earl opposite the other night, in respect to the extent of our obligations under those Treaties, and I heard nothing to which I could take exception. He said something, indeed, ambiguous with regard to the Tripartite Treaty, and he may be of opinion that even now if France or Austria should call upon us to interfere or to fight for the independence and integrity of Turkey, we should then be bound to do so. I will not enter into that question. I should like to see any Government of the present day, after what has happened, attempt to fight for Turkey. But I have great confidence in the Foreign Secretary. I feel quite sure that when he comes to interpret closely any Treaty which compels us to fight or do anything of that sort, his destructive criticism will be amply sufficient to enable him to find a way out of it, and to retreat to the safe ground of that policy in which he takes such delight—namely, the policy of doing nothing. But there is one point in the Treaty of 1856, to which I should like to direct the attention of the House. It is the real crux—a difficulty not theoretical but practical—and that is the language used in these Treaties about the independence of Turkey—not the integrity, for this is not just now in question, but the independence of Turkey. I am afraid that the Turks, and the supporters of the Turks, put an interpretation on that word which will not stand investigation for a moment. My Lords, I hope the House and the country will look at facts, and not at mere phrases, with regard to the independence of Turkey. Now, let me call attention to some Parliamentary Papers that have been before us for a long time. We know that the late Lord Dalling, better known as Sir Henry Bulwer, was sent to Constantinople to carry into effect the policy of Lord Palmerston, to support in every way the independence of Turkey, and no man complained more bitterly than Sir Henry Bulwer of other Powers and Ambassadors interfering with that independence; but how did he treat the Turkish Government himself? He treated it as mud under his feet. In one of the despatches in the Blue Book of 1860 I find a note from Sir Henry Bulwer to the Grand Vizier, in which he coolly lays down this principle to the Prime Minister of Turkey—that all reforms which the Turks could not understand must be carried into effect by Europeans; and then he proceeds to say that it is quite evident that the Turkish race is perfectly effete, and that it is absolutely necessary to supplant them in certain offices by European officials. Conceive such an address being sent to the Prime Minister of any country by the Ambassador of any friendly Power professing a respect for the country's independence! These are the words he addresses to the Grand Vizier—

"It is utterly impossible to govern this vast territory in the way in which it is governed, and it is equally impossible to govern by the Turkish race alone, and without regard to Europeans. An administration upon a satisfactory basis can never be carried out without recourse to a new race, and energy can never be infused into affairs."

That is the way in which he talks of the independence of Turkey. Then look how the present Government have been treating Turkey. Look what they have done by way of settling the matter of the Salonica massacre, which, so far as we know, was a purely accidental massacre. The Turkish Government were greatly horrified at what had happened. They sent down legal functionaries to try the perpetrators of the massacre, and a certain number of people were convicted, and certain punishments awarded. But the Consuls of Germany and France, the countries to which the unfortunate victims belonged, not satisfied with the administration of justice, demanded that more persons should be tried, and that those who had been tried should be tried again and severer punishment inflicted upon them. What did Her Majesty's Government do? They wrote to their Minister at Constantinople, and said—"You will support this demand of the other Powers so far as you think it just." That may have been right enough—I am not complaining of it; but what does it imply? It implies an absolute want of confidence in the justice of Turkey. It implies a confession, spoken from the housetop to the world, that in respect to the administration of justice, Turkey is in the position of a barbarous Power. My Lords, I need not argue this further, especially as the noble Marquess (the Marquess of Salisbury) has applied his immense talent for satire in the quiet language in which he has referred to this doctrine of the independence of Turkey. I envy the pen of the man who wrote this passage—

"The independence of Turkey is a phrase which is, of course, capable of varying interpretations. At the present time it must be independent so as to be consistent with the conjoint diplomatic action taken in recent times by the other Powers of Europe."

Well, I hope we shall hear no more of the independence of Turkey as a doctrine which is to prevent us and the other Powers of Europe from demanding and from insisting, under certain conditions and circumstances, that the Turkish Government shall render justice to all their subjects. Well, then, as to the guarantees of the Treaty of 1856, there is apparently no substantial difference of opinion between us and the noble Earl opposite. As the noble Earl himself said in answer to a deputation, those guarantees were guarantees against murder, and not against suicide—a very good epigrammatic definition, which, however, must be interpreted to mean nothing less than this—that we have not guaranteed Turkey against any of the natural consequences which follow from misgovernment. And this is a doctrine of very wide sweep indeed—covering all the dangers to which Turkey is now exposed. The Turks are cutting their own throats, though they do not seem to know it. They are so misgoverning their own people that they are becoming an offence and a scandal to the world, and against the natural consequences of that misconduct we never have, and we never shall guarantee the independence of Turkey. Has it not been suicide which the Turkish Government have been guilty of? For 20 years, since the peace of 1856, they have been enjoying tranquillity, perfect rest, and immunity from external disturbance, and what is the result? The result is a Government bad with utter badness. If any noble Lord in this House thinks that I exaggerate, I refer him to the Papers laid before us by the Government. He will find overwhelming evidence that it is a Government under which life is insecure; that it is a Government under which the fruits of industry are insecure; that it is a Government under which the honour of families is insecure. Moreover, he will find that this insecurity arises, not from mere brigandage, not from want of law, but from the acts of the officers and agents of the Government itself. They are the men who commit murders, and under whose care life and property and family honour are insecure. Then you will find from the Blue Books that the Christian population of Turkey suffer under this most terrible aggravation of all other sufferings—that they have no hope of redress from the tribunals of the country, that there is not a single Judge in Turkey who is not venal, that there is not a single court to which Christians can appeal with the conviction that their evidence will be allowed due weight, or, indeed, any weight at all, when they are pitted against the interests and the passions of the Mohammedan majority of the country. The evidence comes to this, my Lords—that in the Christian provinces of Turkey its Government is nothing better than a permanent Government by Bashi-Bazouks. And here, my Lords, I should like to refer for a moment to an observation which fell from me on the first night, of the Session on the subject of the right of insurrection, and which excited some murmurs of disapprobation from my noble Friends opposite. I have been thinking often, since then, what can have been the cause of these murmurs—and I have come to the conclusion that in all probability they expressed a feeling in which I heartily sympathize. There is a good deal of very loose language held in the world now-a-days in respect to what is called political crime. There are many people who seem to think that men may convulse the country to which they belong, deluge it with blood, and expose its inhabitants to all the horrors of civil war, and that all these crimes are rendered virtues if only they can allege some motive which they call political. Detestable doctrine, my Lords! And if noble Lords thought I was giving expression to any feeling of this kind, I do not wonder at their murmurs—indeed, I thank them for them—but what I meant was very different. My proposition was not a general but a particular proposition—applicable to the special case of the Government of Turkey such as it now is—and what I said was this—that in a country where life, property, and honour are insecure, where courts are venal and justice is not to be obtained, where the Government does not guarantee to their people any one of the primary rights of humanity, there, I say, our sympathies should be with those who rise against such oppression, and not with the Government which by such conduct challenges and justifies insurrection. Can this proposition be gainsaid in any assembly of Englishmen? Surely we cannot forget that our own liberties have been obtained by successful insurrections, and it is not for us to denounce men who have revolted against such a form of Government as that which has been proved to exist in Turkey. My Lords, you must have misunderstood me, and I must have misunderstood you.

Well, my Lords, what happened when the insurrection broke out in the Herzegovina? I can quite understand the language of those who say that we have no more to do with cruelties or oppression in Turkey than we have to do with the "Customs" of Dahomey. I repudiate this doctrine as applied to the Christian population of European Turkey—but I understand it. It is consistent at least with perfect impartiality between the insurgents and the Government of Turkey. But was this the course pursued by Her Majesty's Government? No. I contend that when Her Majesty's Government heard of that insurrection in 1875, they were not impartial, they were not indifferent; they were active partisans of the Turkish Government against the population which rose against Turkish rule. They were unceasing in their entreaties to the Turkish Government to put the insurrection down as soon as they could, and in their exhortations to other countries, and especially to Austria, not to allow interference on behalf of the insurgents by neighbouring sympathisers. ["Hear!"] I hear a cheer from a noble Lord on my own side of the House, implying, perhaps, that it was right to prevent the help of external sympathisers. But I beg you to remember who those sympathisers were. They were the descendants of men who had fled from Turkish oppression in former times—friends, neighbours, and often kinsmen of those who are now in revolt. You had no moral right to deprecate such sympathy, or to prevent the insurgents getting such help. I ask was such action impartiality? Do not tell me it was impartiality to be calling upon the Government of Austria to put down and to prevent the just and natural sympathy with the insurgents of neighbouring populations—I say it was taking almost as active a part on one side as the English Government could have taken. But that is not all. The Austrian Government, when refugees from the Turkish Provinces came into its territory, gave them out of mere humanity a small allowance to keep them alive. Now, I see that through your agents and your Ambassadors you were urging the Austrian Government to withdraw this miserable pittance—not only this—they were urging them to send back those people into Turkey at the very time when your own agents were telling you that they could give them no sort of security that they would not be murdered within a month; and, urged by the Austrian Government which was urged by you, some of those unfortunate people did go back, and were murdered. I say that the Government of England, so far as their diplomatic representations were successful in urging the Austrian Government to send back those people, are responsible for their fate. Then, again, I see that you objected to volunteers. Of course, I admit that International Law forbids the enlistment of volunteers; but International Law breaks down under such circumstances as these. You cannot insist upon its maxims when dealing with conditions so anomalous, or with a Government so barbarous as that of Turkey. In your own country you have not been able to prevent English sympathisers in hundreds and thousands going off to fight against foreign Governments. This, then, is another way in which you showed your animus in favour of keeping up the Turkish Government against those who live under it at any cost to them, because, forsooth, it was supposed that the interests of England required such a policy. This is the policy which I denounced in the autumn as unjust and immoral. I denounce it as unjust and immoral still, and I hold that it was all the more immoral in this case because you had evidence before you that the rising in Herzegovina—I am not now speaking of the rising in Bulgaria, of which we knew nothing till we heard of the massacre—was not instigated by foreign agents, but was the natural consequence of abominable oppression; and, moreover, that the insurgents held the most just and moderate views as to the demands they were entitled to make upon the Turkish Government. I confess that the Blue Books have not impressed me with the accuracy or the extent of knowledge possessed by our Consuls. Almost all their information appears to be derived from Turkish sources. You almost invariably find in their reports “—— Pasha told me this,” or “the Turkish General told me that.” The fact is, after what I have read in those Blue Books, I do not believe a word which rests alone on such authority. There were very few occasions in which the Consuls got into communication with the people themselves. There is one instance, however, in which a Consul did get in contact with the insurgents—I refer to Mr. Consul Holmes—and this is the account which he gives—

“I would here remark that, contrary to what is asserted in so many newspapers, the people of Herzegovina neither demand nor have ever deserved an impossible autonomy as Servian agitators would have persuaded them to do. They only ask to remain subjects of the Sultan, with reformed laws, under proper and just administration of them. How to secure this is the difficulty.”

That is the account given by Mr. Consul Holmes of the first insurgents in the Herzegovina—these men wanted nothing but security for their lives and liberties under an European guarantee, and these are the people against whom you levied the whole battery of English diplomacy, in order that the Turkish Government might put down their insurrection and that neighbouring Governments should prevent any exercise of sympathy with the oppressed people. And what is the reason? How is it that humane and honourable men—men I well know personally as humane as any on this side of the House—came to justify yourselves in acting on such a cruel and unjust policy? I believe it was entirely due to what is now known by the name of Russophobia, which makes you imagine that every insurrection in the Christian Provinces of Turkey is due to Russian intrigue. You who support the Government always speak of us, the opponents of this policy, as men influenced by sentiment, and as having no more intellect than snipes; the reasoning faculties—the brains—are all on that side of the House. I should like to test this assumption for a moment. What, I should like to know, would be said in physical philosophy, of the reasoning powers—of the intellect—of the brains of a man who, seeing in his laboratory certain results, and knowing of the presence of one sufficient cause, would nevertheless insist on attributing it to some other cause which he did not know to be present at all; and which, even if it were present, is insufficient to account for the facts? Yet this is exactly the position of the Government in regard to the insurrections in Turkey. You cannot deny that the Government of Turkey is utterly bad—you know that in that mis-government you have a sufficient cause for all the effects before you. But, no; you must fall back on Russian intrigues. It reminds one of the query in the “Rejected Addresses” at the time when in this country there was a mania against the First Napoleon

—“Who fills the butcher’s shops with large blue flies?” And the answer was Bonaparte. Well the policy to which I have been adverting was that pursued by Her Majesty’s Government till the end of August or the beginning of September in last year—that is, during the months which elapsed between the proposal of the Berlin Note and the adjournment of Parliament. You were objecting to everything the other Powers proposed, and proposing nothing yourselves. Your own description of your position was that you were deprecating any interference in the internal affairs of Turkey by the other Powers; deprecating all movement in favour of the insurgents. Well, my Lords, holding up your hands in deprecation of all active exertion, in the presence of the great movements which determine the history of the world, is not a very helpful or a very hopeful attitude. And what is it the Government has been deprecating? You have been deprecating facts—awkward things to deprecate—living facts—facts which were passing before your eyes. You were deprecating the sympathies and the feelings of enormous populations—feelings and sympathies which are among the most powerful of all facts in politics. Well, but at last this policy was changed, and changed by what? We heard of the dreadful massacres in Bulgaria, and the conscience of the country then awoke to the deplorable and horrible results of this policy, supporting Turkey at all risks and costs. My Lords, I do not know what history will say regarding this repentance. I am afraid history will say that it was a somewhat late repentance; but of this I am sure—that it is a repentance, which, whether late or not, is now sincere and universal, and that it is a repentance which never will be repented of. The people and the Government of this country have now awoke to the discovery that the Government of Turkey is a barbarous Government. We have been shocked to see the horrors of African warfare in the heart of Christendom, and the horrid cruelties of Gengis Khan in the days of Queen Victoria. Well, then, before the storm of public indignation the noble Earl, I must say, with the most perfect frankness, told Turkey that it had become impossible to pursue his former policy of protecting Turkey from the consequences of her own misgovernment. He gave no hint, indeed, of any repentance—of any change in his own mind. He simply said that the former policy was one which the feelings of this country could no longer tolerate. Yes, thank God, it is! Well, then, I say that during a period of many months, up to the beginning of September, 1876, you had been so impressing Turkey with the idea that you would be her friends at all costs, that there was no chance of her giving way to the other Powers. You did all you could to prevent Turkey agreeing to the demands of the Powers. You were dragged—reluctantly—into a sort of concert with those Powers in the Andrassy Note; but further than that you would not go, and directly and indirectly you were encouraging Turkey to resist the will of united Europe. But in the beginning of September you entered on a new policy; and now I come to my next proposition—that you have pursued this new policy with such half-heartedness and such timidity that it had no chance of success. So late as September 5, what was the language of your Minister at Constantinople—language, of course, held by order from home? Speaking of European guarantees for good government in Turkey, he says that this would lead to results “against which Her Majesty’s Government has throughout set their face.” But what must the Turks have thought if they knew that such was even then still the language of the British Minister? Why, they must have been convinced that there was no change in your policy, notwithstanding that the massacres in Bulgaria had made it impossible for you to actively interfere in their defence; that you were for the moment coerced by the popular sentiment, but that as soon as you could you would turn round again—in other words, that you were still holding to what are called “English interests,” and were on the side of Turkey and against the other Powers of Europe. And now let us see what you were doing during the rest of the two months of September and October. You made great efforts to bring about an armistice between Turkey and Servia as a preliminary to peace, on terms which were to guarantee some liberty to the subjects of Turkey. With great difficulty all the Powers were at last got in line, and Russia agreed to the English basis of peace—a basis which I am far from saying was not a reasonable basis. Credit is due to you for your endeavours to get all the Powers in a line, and at last you succeeded. What happened? There are no secrets of diplomacy in these days. Everything seems to be known. Many of your Lordships will remember the tone in which Lord Ellenborough used to denounce the want of secrecy in the India Department. What would he say if he were alive to read the revelations of the present day? What you were doing was perfectly well known. It was perfectly well known that you were trying to get the Powers of Europe to agree on terms of peace, having as a basis the necessity of some European interference in the internal Government of Turkey. Well, now all this time Turkey knew, through Sir Henry Elliot, as we have seen, that you admitted this principle with reluctance. Her object was to get rid of this principle. She might reform herself, but there was to be no interference with her on the part of the Powers of Europe. So that the antithesis was this—you were laying down a basis of peace with a view to external interference; whereas, on the other hand, the great aim of Turkey was to have an armistice with a view to self-reform, and no external interference. And what occurred? On the 11th of October the Turks made a counter proposal. After you had got Russia, Italy, France, and Austria to agree to a short term of armistice, with a Conference behind, the Turks turn round and say—"No, we shall not give you that; but we will give you a six months' armistice without a Conference." What did the noble Earl the Foreign Secretary do? He jumped at the Turkish offer like a salmon at a fly, and immediately telegraphed, "By all means." What was the consequence? Austria, which after the greatest difficulty had been got to agree to your terms, came to the Foreign Office and asked if it was really true that England had abandoned her own proposals, and had agreed to the counter-propositions of the Porte—counter-propositions which were essentially different in principle and in effect. Here is the noble Earl's account of it. In a despatch to Sir Andrew Buchanan, dated the 19th of September, he says—

"Count Andrassy stated to your Excellency, in the conversation reported in your telegram of the 17th instant, that he wished me to state clearly what course Her Majesty's Government are disposed to maintain and recommend in order that he might act in concert with them. Her Majesty's Government have every wish to communicate most frankly with Count Andrassy and reciprocate his wish for concerted action. It is their desire that you should inform him that, having accepted the proposal of the Porte for an armistice of six months, they will make no new proposition."

Thus, the other Powers found that they had been thrown overboard, and that Her Majesty's Government had agreed to the counter proposal of the Turks. What did Russia do in the circumstances? It addressed a similar inquiry to the noble Earl, and asked whether it was possible that England had thrown over its own proposal for a short armistice—

THE EARL OF DERBY, interrupting, said, that what the Government asked was that the armistice should not be for less than a month.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL: The mere duration of the armistice, taken by itself, is not the point—the point I wish to impress upon your Lordships is, that the longer armistice, coupled with Turkish self-reform, was intended by the Turks to negative the proposed Conference and European interference. Well, the Russian Government, mortified and confounded by the line taken by the English Government, asked whether it was really true that the English Government had abandoned its own proposals, or had ceased to press them upon the Porte? And here is the noble Earl's reply, dated October 24, 1876—

"It was true, therefore, that these proposals (namely, the English basis assented to by all the Powers) had ceased to be pressed upon the Porte!"

The only conclusion at which the other Powers could arrive was that they were dealing with a vacillating and timid Power, which had no backbone of policy of its own. The Turks, on the other hand, thought—and had every right to think—that the English Government would do all they could on their behalf. From the difficulty into which our Government had thus got they were delivered only by the firmness of the Emperor of Russia. The Czar said, in effect—"If England chooses to go back from proposals made and accepted by the whole of Europe, I will not be fooled by Turkey in this way!"

and he sent an ultimatum to Turkey demanding that within 10 days she must give a six weeks' armistice to Servia; and the English Government were relieved from their difficulty by the success of that ultimatum. What happened? Very soon after that, Lord Augustus Loftus had an interview with the Emperor of Russia in the Crimea, and the Czar then remarked that what had been done by Turkey in response to the ultimatum, was the successful result of a little firmness. My Lords, when I read that I confess I experienced feelings akin to shame. There have been days when not even a Czar of Russia could pat an English Minister on the back and say—"See, my good man, what a little firmness can do."

Next came the mission of the noble Marquess opposite (the Marquess of Salisbury); and even in the conduct of the Government during the course of that mission I see the same timidity and half-heartedness which has ruined the policy of Her Majesty's Government in every stage of these transactions. And here I must say, that if I admired the courage and the self-sacrifice of my noble Friend in undertaking this mission before I saw these Papers, I admire that courage much more now. My Lords, it was a mission foredoomed to failure. Look at the very first step which was taken. The noble Earl the Foreign Secretary on several occasions stated that he would not consent to a Conference on Turkish affairs from which the representatives of Turkey were excluded. On the other hand, Russia objected to a Conference in which Turkey should be admitted to see the differences which might arise between the other Powers. In this difficulty some subtle diplomatist whispered into the ear of the noble Earl, as the serpent whispered into the ear of Eve, a truly wonderful suggestion. Cut the Conference into two. Have two separate series of meetings—one to be called "Preliminary," from which Turkey shall be excluded, and the second not to be so called, and to which Turkey may be admitted! And where, my Lords, do you think the Preliminary Conferences were held? Why, in the Russian Embassy! Could any device have been hit upon which combined more curiously every possible objection? Could there have been any combination of circumstances more fitted to rouse the suspicions and to offend the pride of Turkey? Was it possible to ensure more certainly the refusal of Turkey to agree to any terms agreed upon under such circumstances? Turkey knew that she had nothing to fear, and, perhaps, much to hope, from you, in the event of such rejection. For I would remark, further, that on the 22nd of December in last year the noble Earl opposite, in a despatch to the noble Marquess who represented this country at the Conference, stated that—

"Her Majesty's Government have decided that England will not assent to, or assist in, coercive measures, military or naval, against the Porte."—[Turkey, No. 2, p. 56.]

Well, Her Majesty Government had a perfect right to arrive at any decision that pleased them as to the course which they would take; but I find that on the 24th of December—two days later than that of the despatch from which I have quoted—a most mysterious telegram was despatched from Constantinople by Safvet Pasha to Musurus Pasha, the Turkish Minister in this country. The telegram was in the following terms:—

"I have read it to the Grand Vizier" [what the 'it' was that was read is not given in the Blue Book]. "His Royal Highness received this communication with deep gratitude, and begs you to express to his Excellency Lord Derby his acknowledgments. You will explain to his Lordship, in the name of the Grand Vizier, that the Sublime Porte reckons more than ever on the kind support of the Government of Her Britannic Majesty, under the difficult circumstances we are passing through."—[Turkey, No. 2, p. 62.]

I ventured to hint on the first night of the Session that an intimation had been conveyed to the Porte to the effect that no attempts at coercion would be made or approved by Her Majesty's Government; but the noble Marquess opposite shook his head so violently that I was intimidated by the vehemence of his denial. Since then I have looked again into the Blue Books, and the result of my search has been the discovery of the documents which I have read—the last of which is both curious and mysterious. I should much like to know what "it" was that Safvet Pasha read to the Grand Vizier, and if no objection is raised I would move for a copy of the document furnished to Musurus Pasha and by him transmitted to Constantinople. And now, my Lords, what is the result of all this? We find that the noble Marquess who represented England at the Conference wound up his part in it by telling Turkey that England was determined to leave her to her fate, she having deliberately rejected the advice which he, as England's representative, had offered to her. What did that mean? Everyone knows what that means. It meant that we would leave Turkey to be dealt with by Russia. There is no mystery about it. And this is the upshot of all our feeble policy—to leave Turkey in the hands of Russia! For the first time, when I read this, I began to mourn over the Crimean War. Alas, for all those brave men who now lie mouldering on the moors of the Crimea or have found in the Black Sea "their wild and wandering graves?"

My Lords, what is our position now? Again let me recall to the mind of the House the position in which we are placed by the Instructions issued to Lord Salisbury. We have laid down these two propositions in language which can never be retracted—first, that we have a right to demand of the Porte some protection for her Christian subjects, and next, that we cannot trust the Turk to fulfil his own promise on their behalf. These are the declarations of the English Special Envoy—declarations to which the Government is pledged; and what I now wish to know is whether you mean to keep by those declarations or whether you mean to abandon them? I also desire to know from noble Lords opposite whether they mean to keep up the European concert? My Lords, I always understood before I read these Blue Books—and this is one of the very few points which are entirely novel even to those who have attended closely to the subject—I always understood that it had been found almost impossible to induce Austria to adopt any line which even looked in the direction of coercion. But that is not the evidence of the Blue Books. Three times in the month of September—and the latest date is the 21st—I find that Austria is distinctly recorded as having declared to the noble Earl opposite that it was not sufficient to obtain the conclusion of an armistice; that it became of the highest importance that conditions of peace should be agreed upon without delay by the Powers and "enforced by them upon the Porte."

Therefore, you have the evidence of the noble Earl himself that up the 21st of September, if not later, Austria would be willing, if you managed her wisely, and if you made proposals to the Government of Turkey which would have met with her approval, to join you in measures of coercion. Here are the words of the noble Earl as addressed to Sir Andrew Buchanan—

"The Austrian Chargé d'Affaires called upon me this afternoon and communicated the substance of a despatch from Count Andrassy. . . . For these reasons it is not sufficient to obtain the conclusion of an armistice. It becomes of the highest importance that conditions of peace should be agreed upon without delay by the Powers, and enforced by them on the Porte."

All this confirms what I have already said, that the one obstacle throughout these transactions to a firm and effective concert of the European Powers, has been the determined opposition of Her Majesty's Government to every proposal for effective action.

And here I wish, my Lords, to refer to one observation which fell from the noble Marquess opposite on the first night of the Session. He said, have you thought out, have you spelled out for yourselves what coercion means? It means, he said, the bombardment of Stamboul, and nothing else. Now, I am not going into that subject, but I wish distinctly to say that I have thought out the meaning—all the possible meanings—of the word coercion, and that I wholly dissent from the dogma of my noble Friend that it means nothing but the bombardment of Stamboul. I have a distinct and clear opinion that if Europe had been really united—if you had used your best endeavours when it was possible to unite Europe upon just and moderate proposals, giving security to the inhabitants of Turkey, and yet not seriously interfering with either the independence or the integrity of Turkey—if you had brought Europe, as you might have done, to act together for the purpose of imposing your will upon Turkey, there are more ways of coercion than one—there are more modes than two, or three, or six, by which you might and would have brought Turkey to her knees, and the whole of this terrible danger to Europe might and would have been avoided.

ment to revert to the impression that was left upon many minds, and I confess upon my own, by the speech of the noble Earl the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs on the first night of the Session. It was not so much anything he distinctly said in so many words—it was the general tone and drift of that speech which gave me the impression that his disposition now is to wash his hands of the whole affair—to say we have done what we could for the inhabitants of Turkey; the Turks have rejected our advice; we have announced to them that we will leave them to their fate; we have nothing more to hope and nothing more to say. My Lords, I do hope I have put an erroneous interpretation upon that speech. I must say that I think it would be in the highest degree dishonourable if, having publicly declared through our Envoy at Constantinople that we thought it our duty and our interest and our right to procure some protection for the Christian inhabitants of Turkey, we should now give up those declarations, abandon those claims of right, and say we have nothing more to say to the matter.

My Lords, the noble Marquess opposite asked me if I had analyzed the meaning of the word “force.” Let me ask him if he has analyzed the meaning of the language held by his own Colleague when he said that the result of the noble Marquess’s Conference at Constantinople was to reduce the demands upon Turkey to so small a point that it was evidently not worth fighting for. Has he analyzed the meaning of that argument? I understood the noble Marquess, when he spoke of the minima, that these minima were still sufficient for the protection of the Christian people of Turkey—barely sufficient, but that they were sufficient, and that being sufficient, he accepted them. But, my Lords, if they are sufficient, and if nothing short of them is sufficient, and if you cannot trust the promise of the Turk—and no one has said that more clearly than the noble Marquess—then, I ask, why were they not worth fighting for? If your demand was a real and not a sham demand for the good government of Turkey, then all the duty, all the obligation, to which you have confessed regarding it, lies upon you as a duty and an obligation still.

Now, my Lords, I wish noble Lords opposite clearly to understand what the Question is of which I have given Notice, because it has been absurdly misrepresented out-of-doors. It has been said that I wish to force the hands of the Government, and to know whether they are to go to war or not—whether they are to use coercion or not—that I wish for a declaration of their policy in principle and effect. My Lords, I have not asked that; I think I should have no right to ask it. It is a question which no Member of an Opposition has a right to ask of any Government, and I trust noble Lords opposite will keep the future in their own hands. They have already sacrificed the future far too much—they have declared what they will not do and what they will do. I wish them to keep their own counsels. My Lords, what I ask is this—“Whether you have under consideration any measure for the fulfilment of the promises which you have made to the population of Turkey, or do you mean to abandon them altogether?”

My Lords, before I sit down, I trust that the noble Earl opposite (the Earl of Beaconsfield) will allow me to make a personal appeal to him. He is at the head of one of the most powerful Governments which this country has ever seen—he has the confidence and affection of his Party, and he has their entire and devoted allegiance in a manner and to an extent which few Ministers have ever enjoyed. My Lords, at one time in the course of this year the noble Earl gave public intimation—otherwise I should not feel myself at liberty to refer to it—that it was his desire at no distant day to retire from the fatigues and cares of his great office. That, my Lords, is an intimation which never fails to arouse sympathy and interest of all. In the generous contests of our public life we have no private grudges and no personal enmities. The noble Earl will retire when he desires to do so with the affection of many around him—of young men whom he has encouraged on their entering into public life, of older men whom he has led against all hope to victory and success. But, my Lords, the noble Earl will not retire—if ever he does retire—with any better wish from any one of these than the wish which I shall give him, and it is this—that when he looks back to this Government, of which he is the distinguished head, he may be able to say that he has wielded the great influence and power of England for the purpose and with the effect of procuring some measure of tolerable liberty for the Christian subjects of Turkey, and that in procuring that measure of tolerable liberty he has secured it on such conditions as will guarantee them for the future not only against the odious barbarism of the Turks, but also against the crushing autocracy of the Russian Czars. My Lords, the Question I have to put to Her Majesty's Government is, not what measures, but whether they have any measures in contemplation for the fulfilment of the promises which they have held out to the people of Turkey to protect them from further cruel oppression?

THE EARL OF DERBY: My Lords, no man who has listened to the speech of the noble Duke, whatever may be his opinions on the question at issue, can fail to admire its eloquence and power, or to respect the sincerity and obvious earnestness which have inspired the address we have just heard. I have listened to that speech with no desire to complain of the course taken by the noble Duke. I think that the condemnation he passed upon the policy of the Government is not borne out by the facts of the case; of one thing, however, I am glad—that the noble Duke should have taken the earliest opportunity in his power to bring this question before your Lordships' House. It is not possible for any new arguments to be brought before your Lordships on the part of the Government. Our case has been already laid without reserve before Parliament and the country in the Blue Books, and I have no new facts to offer. I have only such explanations to give as would naturally suggest themselves to the candour and judgment of any fair-minded man who reads the Papers on your Lordships' Table. It is, I need not say, a satisfaction to us, who are responsible for the conduct of affairs, that after a long period of vague criticism and of unfriendly comments and of charges to which it was impossible to reply, and which it was sometimes even difficult to understand—it is satisfactory to be able to meet face to face the charges of inconsistency, vacillation, and change of policy which have been made against us—to feel assured that we know all that can be said, and that there can be no other accusation in reserve against us. I shall, I think, discharge my task best if I attempt to follow the noble Duke through the proceedings to which he referred. The noble Duke began by an observation from which I take leave to dissent. He said that the Instructions to my noble Friend, which he took as the foundation of his remarks, were intended to accomplish two objects—first, the improvement of the internal administration of Turkey, and next the maintenance of European peace. I agree that these were the two objects which we had mainly in view, although as a matter of style I should have put the maintenance of the peace of Europe as the first and most important. And the noble Duke went on to assert that in both these objects we have failed. Now I do not want to repeat the remarks I made a few days ago; but I must again ask your Lordships whether it is not a little too early—whether it is not a little premature—to talk of the action of the Government and of the proceedings of the Conference at Constantinople as having failed in accomplishing both these objects. It cannot yet be said that the peace of Europe has been broken: nor can it be predicted with certainty that no improvement in Turkish administration will result from the Conference. Changes and improvements of a fundamental character in the administration of any country cannot be made in a day; nor can it be said, because the particular scheme recommended by the Conference has not been adopted, and because the desired guarantees have not been conceded by the Porte, that the Turkish Government have a fixed purpose to reject all internal reforms. The noble Duke contends that the failure of which he speaks was owing to two causes—one being the policy which Her Majesty's Government pursued until August, and the other the feebleness and faint-heartedness with which they followed up their policy when they entered upon a new course. I do not admit either the failure or the reasons assigned. I do not want to go into detail, but I must observe that when this charge of a change of policy was advanced by the noble

Earl (Earl Granville) the other night I endeavoured to meet it. I said that so far from leading the Turks, at the time of the rejection of the Berlin Memorandum, to believe that we were willing to fight for them, we announced as early as the month of May last year that the course we should pursue was of an entirely different character. I stated then, and I repeat it now, that in that respect there had been no change in the policy we adopted. Of course, I admit that we have been obliged to modify in some respects our course of action as circumstances themselves have altered. This is a change which every Government must have gone through that has been placed in similar circumstances. Any one who has filled a responsible post must know that every Government is called upon to alter its course in certain cases; and it was only natural that at a moment when there was imminent danger of an European war we should be willing, in order to avert that war, to do some things, and to accept some things which we should not have done nor accepted if there had been nothing more in question than the suppression of a petty, local insurrection. The noble Duke has referred to a speech that I made more than 12 years ago—in the year 1864—and he seemed to contrast the language I then held with the action of the Government of which I am a Member. I do not mean to suggest as an excuse that the language of anyone in a position of irresponsibility and speaking of questions of policy in an abstract manner must necessarily be very different from that which would be held by a person responsible for the conduct of affairs, though something might be said for that view of the case. But what was it, after all, that I said in 1864, and that is so contrary to our present position? I said that the Turkish Government was in a very bad way; and I am afraid that there can be no doubt upon that point. I said it was a mistake to support that Government in such a manner as to make ourselves enemies among those subject Christian races who were before many years likely to become the dominant races of the Empire. I do not know after 12 years' experience—part of the time at the Foreign Office—that I have anything to retract in the speech I then made, although I may have been a little too sanguine in the expectations I then formed as to the future of the Christians of Turkey. We have always held that the Turkish Government could only be maintained by the amelioration of its internal administration. That language has been used by ourselves and by our predecessors since the year 1856, and from that language we have never swerved. I mentioned Egypt and Constantinople as the two great points in which English interests were concerned in this Turkish question, and I say the same now. Where, then, is the inconsistency? The noble Duke, in referring to the Treaty of 1856, said he hoped he would hear nothing more of the independence of the Porte. I agree with my noble Friend the noble Marquess when he said at Constantinople that "independence was a very relative term." In all parts and in all ages of the world a State which is not able to protect itself is exposed to the dictation of stronger neighbours, and that may have been the case with Turkey; but I do not think that the instances to which the noble Duke referred as showing our disregard of Turkish independence helped him much. He quoted some language held by Sir Henry Bulwer long ago; but whatever that language may have been (and it is new to me) I do not see how the use of it bears upon anything done by the present Government. He referred to the action of the Government in the affair of the Salonica massacre. Ours was, of necessity, a secondary part on that occasion. The French and German Consuls had been murdered. Their Governments took the matter up; and with a view of keeping the peace and preventing matters from going to extremities by excessive demands on the part of those Powers or by undue resistance on the part of the Porte, we directed our efforts to bring about a peaceable settlement of the matter. I do not see that this showed any disregard of Turkish independence. We should have taken the same part in the case of any quarrel between European States, where we had a hope of being able to mediate with effect. The noble Duke referred to a remark of mine that we might be bound to protect the Turkish Empire from murder, but it was no part of our duty to protect it from suicide. He seemed to found on that remark an argument that I claimed the right to interfere with the independence of the Turkish Government. So far from that, my language pointed to an exactly opposite conclusion. If I had intended any interference in the internal affairs of Turkey, the language which I should have used would have been, not that I would not, but that I did undertake to guarantee the Porte against suicide. The noble Duke has spoken with great severity—perhaps in language somewhat over-coloured—though I am not prepared to say with entire injustice of the administration of the Turkish Provinces; but when he enlarged on the opportunities of improvement which Turkey has had he went a little too far. He said that during the last 20 years Turkey had been enjoying peace and perfect tranquillity; but the fact is that during that time the Turkish Government has had two serious insurrections to put down; and, though it has had an unlimited supply of European capital, unfortunately that supply of capital has done more harm than good, for very little of it has been expended in the way of improving the administration and developing the resources of the country. Coming to more serious matters, the noble Duke finds fault with the course we adopted at the first outbreak of the insurrection in Herzegovina. He said, substantially—"I can understand your saying that we have nothing to do with it; but I do not understand your taking part with the oppressors against the oppressed." But what are the real facts with regard to that matter? In the first place, I observe, in passing, that there is not a single fact connected with that rising in Herzegovina which was not known to the noble Duke and to your Lordships when these matters were discussed last year, and it is rather late to go back to transactions which have already been under the notice of the House. The noble Duke says—"You entreated the Turks to put down the insurrection." My answer is, it was in its origin a petty local disturbance, and as far as in the circumstances of the time any human judgment could foresee certain to end in the failure of those who promoted it and to bring about a useless loss of life. It was only, I believe, owing to the excessive apathy and indifference of the Turkish authorities that it was allowed to grow into a serious matter. The noble Duke himself admits that nothing can justify insurrection where there is not a reasonable hope of success. If that be so, and if the judgment of the matter which I formed at the time was what I admit it was, I do not think there was anything unreasonable in what I said. What we looked to, and what was more important than the merely local question, was the danger which might ensue to the Empire and ultimately to Europe if disturbances of this kind were allowed to go on. What occurred might have ended in a general disturbance of the peace of Europe; and was it unreasonable to say that Europe had an interest in its suppression? No doubt when you put down an insurrection, force is one element of pacification; but it is not the only element, nor the main element, and it is not fair to quote words written and spoken by me as if it were to be implied that we had been doing nothing but press upon the Porte the duty of suppressing an insurrection by force. It is quite true I frequently warned the Austrian Government as to the manner in which Austrian volunteers were crossing the frontier and entering Herzegovina. If Austria from the beginning had not professed to stand altogether neutral and to take no part we should have had no locus standi in making these representations, and I assuredly should not have made them. But recollect what was the position of Austria at that time. Austria professed a sincere desire to see this insurrection brought to a close. It was with that view that at her instance the Consular Commission was issued and the Andrassy Note was framed. Was it unreasonable or was it not—was it a breach of neutrality, or justice, or fairness to the two parties concerned—that we told the Austrian Government, as we did—"It is of no use your making diplomatic efforts to put down this disturbance or resorting to Consular Commissions, so long as your own people keep it alive, and your own officials, seeing all this, allow them to do as they please?" As to sending back refugees to the frontier there to be murdered, I can only say that the impossibility of referring at the moment to the despatches renders it impossible for me to follow the remarks of the noble Duke; but assuredly no advice was ever given by Her Majesty's Government to send back refugees where personal danger to those so sent back was probable. I cannot at the moment ascertain what it is to which the charges of the noble Duke would point when he speaks of cutting off allowances to starving people. It is possible that allowances made to help the refugees in their distress were diverted to improper purposes and appropriated to the purchase of arms and the support of military operations; and, if so—though I have no recollection of the transaction referred to—I cannot see that there was any objection in pointing out that as a breach of neutrality. The noble Duke ridiculed the idea of our looking for Russian influences or Russian agencies for the cause of these disturbances when ample cause was to be found in the maladministration of the country. I say nothing as to the action of the Russian Government—it is not my duty or my wish to go into that question; but if I affirm that local residents officially connected with the Russian Government were among the most active agents in stirring up these disturbances and assisted the insurgents in various ways, I only state that which is perfectly well known, which can be abundantly proved from the Blue Book, and which I do not suppose the Russian Government would deny. The Russian Consulate at Ragusa was described to me as being the head-quarters of the insurgent chiefs, and when one of the most noted of them was killed in the course of the campaign, the Russian Consul General attended the funeral with every public mark of respect and sympathy. The noble Duke can hardly contend, in face of the published evidence, that Russian influence had nothing to do with these disturbances. The noble Duke then went on to speak of a change in our policy about August or September. If he meant that those lamentable occurrences in Bulgaria, when they became fully known, exercised some influence on our judgment of the situation, he says that which no human being would dispute, and which I have not the slightest wish to deny. That such massacres should have taken place, though confined to one district, undoubtedly shows a degree of feebleness and a want of controlling power in the central Administration of Turkey which was beyond what we could reasonably have supposed to exist. And if in the autumn of last year we adopted a system of interference more active and pronounced than we had done before the Bulgarian outrages, they may to some extent have influenced our course, but the influence which they exercised was altogether secondary, and the main cause of our action was this—that Servia, as we know, had joined in the fight, that the Servian Army was almost entirely composed of Russian volunteers, and that, as a consequence, Russia was in fact, though not in form, in the field. Every Servian defeat was felt in Russia as a Russian defeat, and the danger was that the feeling in that country would become excited until a war with Turkey was inevitable. That was the imminent danger which, in the interests of Europe, we were bound to consider. The noble Duke then went into the long and complicated series of negotiations which ended in an armistice and a Conference: and in doing this the noble Duke only followed a large number of persons in ascribing to the Government a change—hardly a change of policy, but a change of procedure—that never occurred. The fact is, in the first instance, we asked for a suspension of hostilities; but the Turks, whose military affairs were then prospering, were not unnaturally reluctant to stop. They were willing to grant a truce for a few days, but had a strong objection to its being longer than was absolutely necessary. Russia thought that was not sufficient, and desired an armistice for a definite period. There was absolutely no question at the time of an armistice of two months being too short or six months too long. What we were endeavouring to obtain from the Turks, and what they were unwilling to concede, was the granting of an armistice for more than a few days. We asked for one of not less than a month or six weeks, and the Turkish Government replied by offering one of six months—or more accurately, at that time one of five months and a few days. We accepted that offer as being what we had asked and a little more. And I must say I never was more surprised than when I heard that complaint having previously been made of the former suspension [of hostilities as too short, the Russian Government had now changed its ground and objected to that armistice as being too long. By pressure on the Porte Russia succeeded in obtaining an armistice of two months. But it is curious enough that in the result the original proposal was justified, because the Turkish armistice has been extended from two to four months, with the probability of a further extension, which will bring it to the term originally fixed. Then the noble Duke said the Turks proposed a long armistice, without a Conference; you were for a short armistice followed by a Conference, yet you gave up your own plan and accepted theirs. The fact is, we never gave up the idea of a Conference at all; we simply postponed it for the moment, our first object being to stop the fighting and prevent the extension of the war; and we naturally thought that when that object was secured there was no danger of our not being able to bring about the Conference. That is what the noble Duke describes as a policy with no backbone in it, and which he contrasts with the more manly policy of Russia. But the result is the test: we gained our object, and that quite irrespective of the shortening of the armistice by Russian agency. Then came the mission of my noble Friend (the Marquess of Salisbury) to Constantinople. I entirely agree in the just compliments which the noble Duke paid to my noble Friend; but he says the mission of my noble Friend was foredoomed to failure because we stated to the Turkish Government that we did not intend to enforce our demands. I will come to that bye-and-bye. The noble Duke then touched on the question of the preliminary Conferences held without a Turkish plenipotentiary being present. He said the course which my noble Friend adopted combined the inconveniences of both forms of Conference, and either that the Turkish Representative should have been present all through, or should have been altogether excluded. Well, our feeling was that it was more friendly, more courteous, and, if I may use the expression, more respectful to the Porte—which may be allowed to have something to say on its own affairs—that the Turkish Representative should not be called to attend those preliminary and informal meetings at which the details of intended reforms were discussed until they were in a state to be submitted to the Turkish Government. It would have been putting the Porte into a false, if not an absurd, position if the head of their Foreign

Department as one of the Members of the Conference, concurred in arranging the plans which were afterwards to be submitted to the Government of which he was a Member, and to be received by him in his capacity of a Representative of that Government. There was no intention at any time that the scheme of the Conference should be peremptorily imposed on the Porte and accepted or rejected without the opportunity of fair consideration. It has been stated that the plans proposed to the Turkish Government were considerably modified from what they were when first submitted to the Conference, and the noble Duke has referred to a mysterious telegram expressing the gratitude of the Porte, in reply, as he supposes, to the intimation which I had made to the Turkish Government, that we did not intend to coerce them. Now, I am not quite sure to what that telegram refers, but of one thing I am sure—it does not refer to this question of coercion. It could not do so, for I had taken good care that all with whom we had to deal should know what our intentions were in going into the Conference. I do not wish to read long extracts from these despatches, but there is one addressed by me to my noble Friend, from which I may be allowed to make this extract. It is dated January 8, 1877—

“The Turkish Ambassador left with me on the 24th ultimo the telegram from Safvet Pasha of which I enclose a copy. His Excellency did not inform me of the text of the communication from him to his Government, of which mention is made in it. I noticed subsequently the expression used in the telegram that, ‘the Sublime Porte counts more than ever on the friendly support of Her Britannic Majesty’s Government in the difficult circumstances through which Turkey is passing.’”

I was a little surprised at the expression, for I was not aware of anything having been said to give rise to it; but I was anxious that no misunderstanding should exist. The telegram goes on to say—

“Being anxious to avoid the possibility of any misconception as to the line of policy followed by Her Majesty’s Government, I addressed a private note to his Excellency reminding him that in an unofficial conversation which had passed between us on the 19th ultimo, I had informed him that although Her Majesty’s Government did not themselves meditate or threaten the employment of active measures of coercion in the event of the proposals of the Powers being refused by the Porte, yet that Turkey must not look to England for assistance or protection if that refusal resulted in a war with other countries. I added that this language, which had been held by me again on subsequent occasions, represented the settled decision of the Government, and that I ventured to repeat it in writing as it was very important that the Sultan's Ministers should be under no misapprehension, and should clearly understand that they must not expect from this country any support in resisting the arrangement now offered to them."—

["Hear, hear!"] Am I to understand from that cheer of the noble Duke that the policy which he supports points to this—that if the reforms of the Powers were not accepted by the Porte, we should proceed by the union of all the European Powers to enforce them on Turkey? I can only say if that is the policy he would recommend, such is not the policy of Her Majesty's Government. My Lords, I came prepared for the discussion of that question of coercion if the noble Duke had gone more fully into it. If the noble Duke or any other Member of your Lordships' House desires to raise it, as applicable to our present policy, I should be prepared to justify the language I hold. I should be prepared to show that coercion is unmeaning, unless it means war, and that war would be fraught with every possible danger to the peace of Europe. I do not enter into that question now, because the noble Duke has not raised it in so direct a form as to justify me in discussing it. The noble Duke says, You have told us what you will not do; but he has abstained from putting the question which naturally follows. Now, tell us what you will do. That, my Lords, is a question which no man in my position can be expected to answer. We have to consider the disposition of other Powers and the possibility of success in any undertaking we may propose. But I may say that ever since the proceedings of the Conference have closed we have not been inactive. We have pressed on Serbia and Montenegro the extreme importance of making peace with Turkey with the least possible delay. What may be the effect of our efforts in that direction a few days will show. If peace is made, one half at least of the object of the Conference will have been accomplished. There remains, of course, the question of internal reforms. As to that I am not prepared as yet to express a definite opinion. But I was much impressed by a suggestion thrown out by Midhat Pasha during the Conference, that the Porte should have a reasonable time allowed to consider what had been suggested and to work out its reforms in its own way; and if within that reasonable time, whatever it might be, nothing was done, he considered that, so far as he was concerned, the Powers would have a right to demand guarantees. But we are now only at the beginning of the Session, and whatever we do or whatever we propose to do for the next five months will be subject to the criticism of Parliament. As we do not yet know what the other European Powers may do, it is not in my power to make a more explicit statement at present. The question of peace or war between Turkey and the Principalities remains still unsettled. If there should be war, I fear that complications may arise which would materially affect the result. If there should be peace, then we shall be free to deal with this question of internal administration and internal reform; and I think your Lordships will admit that the natural course in any country is peace first and reform after. No country can re-organize its administration when it has something like half a million of men under arms watching against invasion, and when its finances are strained to the utmost for the purposes of war. Under such circumstances a beginning may be made; but it can hardly be more than a beginning. It may be reasonably asked by any country intending to work out a plan of reform that there should be at least a possibility of successfully doing so. Time and peace may be fairly asked by the Porte to work out its plans, but without peace there can be no hope of success. My Lords, all I can say at present is that, as I need hardly assure you, I shall be at any time ready to communicate in this House, with the utmost frankness, all the information which the state of affairs may permit.

THE DUKE OF WESTMINSTER said, he did not conceive that there was any need to offer any defence of the share he had taken in the St. James's Hall Conference, nor did he propose to do so; but he might venture to say that that meeting was entirely constitutional, and that it was perfectly competent for those who attended it to discuss passing events. He admitted, at the same time, that while negotiations of a serious and difficult character on an important question of foreign policy were pending, every consideration ought to be shown to the Government of the day. At the time of that meeting, the 8th of December, the public could only move on the lines they then had. Those lines were furnished by the despatches in the Blue Book from the beginning of January of last year to the end of July, and the speeches of Ministers, especially those of the Prime Minister. There was one point in a despatch of the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs of the 19th of May which guided the meeting as to the position taken up by this country towards Turkey. In that despatch, No. 278, Lord Derby said—

“The Government cannot conceal from themselves that the gravity of the situation has arisen in a great measure from the weakness and apathy of the Porte in dealing with the insurrection in its earlier stages, and from the want of confidence in Turkish statesmanship and powers of government shown by the state of financial, military, and administrative collapse into which this country has been allowed to fall. The responsibility of this condition of affairs must rest with the Sultan and his Government, and all that can be done by the Government is to give such friendly counsel as circumstances may require.”

When the language thus used was compared with the speeches of the Prime Minister—especially with the speech at Aylesbury—the meeting and a large party in the country thought that much stress could not be laid on that despatch. There was another despatch of a more decided character, but they were not known at that time. Then came the speeches of the Prime Minister—particularly that at Aylesbury on the 21st September. The Prime Minister then said—

“It would be affectation in me to pretend that the Government is backed by the country. The opinion of a large party in the country would, if carried out, be injurious to the interests of England and fatal to peace.”

And yet that policy was afterwards fully adopted by the Government; but at that time the policy indicated by Ministerial speeches was the only policy known to the country. While on this subject and on the speech of the Prime Minister, he would direct the attention of the House and of the noble Earl to words used by him on the same occasion, and understood to refer to no less a person than Mr. Gladstone. He went on to say—

“The danger at such a moment is this, that designing politicians may take advantage of such sublime sentiments [alluding to a righteous enthusiasm] and may apply them for their sinister ends. I do not think that there is any language that can denounce too strongly conduct of such description. He who at such a moment would avail himself of such a commanding sentiment in order to obtain his own individual ends, to a course which he knows, which he may know to be injurious to the interests of his country, is one who cannot be too strongly condemned. Such conduct outrages the principle of patriotism, it injures the common welfare of humanity in the general havoc and crime it may accomplish, and may be fairly described as worse than any of those Bulgarian atrocities of which we have heard so much.”

He (the Duke of Westminster) would not have ventured to refer to that language, but that it had been quoted by Mr. Fawcett at the meeting as directly affecting the reputation of Mr. Gladstone. He was bound to say that if it had been known on the 8th of December that the policy of Her Majesty's Government in the first stage had given way to the policy of the second stage no Conference would have been held. It seemed to him that it was a matter of great importance that there should have been less reserve on the part of the Government, and more confidence shown in the country; especially as the noble Earl the Foreign Secretary had said that he wished to know the will of the country with regard to its conduct towards Turkey. An eminent Member of the Government, however, had stated that the country knew nothing at all about foreign affairs. Then, with regard to Mr. Gladstone, a gentleman in the other House who, it was said, had been offered a seat on the Treasury Bench, speaking at Lincoln, said—

“It filled him almost with despair when he saw such a man, so able, one who had served his country so long and so well as Mr. Gladstone, so indifferent and so recklessly careless and, apparently, utterly unconscious of the very first principles which ought to govern and guide the conduct of every statesman.”

Now, it was said that it was a most audacious and barefaced thing for the Conference at St. James's Hall to have assumed the title of “National,” seeing that it by no means presented a national character; but he might say that had the room been ten times larger there would have been no room for Conserva-

tives, and the policy it represented turned out after all to be the policy of the Government, who had adopted the national sentiment of the country. He might say that Mr. Gladstone had nothing whatever to do with the meeting at St. James's Hall, except that a few days before he was asked to attend it. And surely it was very hard that such language as he had quoted should have been used towards one who had served his country so long and so well. The second stage of the policy of the Government might be said to be over. The Conference was at an end, and seemed to him to have failed indisputably. A contrary opinion was expressed by some persons on the ground that various Powers of Europe had come to an agreement as to what ought to be done. But what ought to be done had not been done, and no means were taken to make it done. Why did the Conference fail? The Government made it a point to uphold the independence and integrity of Turkey. Notwithstanding, they proposed measures in the Conference directly affecting that independence and integrity. In his opinion these were very proper measures, and not half strong enough. The noble Earl (the Earl of Derby) talked of a petty rebellion in the Herzegovina. Surely the noble Earl could not forget that longing for independence among the population which found vent in every tradition and ballad for 400 years past. The noble Earl could hardly forget these things, and it seemed strange therefore that he should call this a petty revolt. The Government, however, proposed to interfere materially with the internal affairs of the Provinces. These proposals were rejected by the Porte as an interference with its independence and integrity. There was ample warning previously from Sir Henry Elliot that this was likely to be the case; but no measures were taken to coerce the Porte; on the contrary, the Government declared over and over again against the policy of using force. An elaborate measure of reform was constructed for these Provinces, but Her Majesty's Government would not apply the necessary motive power. Now, he thought the country was entitled to know why coercion was altogether inadmissible in this case, seeing that this was the only plan by which the Turks could be brought to reason. The noble

Earl said that coercion meant war; but he (the Duke of Westminster) thought that joint coercion on the part of England, Russia, and Austria, not reckoning France, might have hindered any war, because such a display of force would have brought the Turks to reason. What had prevented this use of force? Was it fear of infringing the provisions of the Treaty of 1856? It could not be that the Treaty of 1856 prevented the use of coercion, because it would have been possible to raise the point with the other Powers and have revised the Treaty as in 1871. In 1863, when there was a proposal to convene a Congress of the Powers to revise the Treaties of Vienna, Lord Palmerston, in a letter to the King of the Belgians, said these Treaties were still in force and formed the basis of the existing arrangements of Europe; and he added—

“Before we can come to any decision about the proposed Congress we should like to know what subjects are to be discussed, and what power it is to possess to give effect to its decisions. If a majority were one way, and a minority, however small, the other way, that minority including the party by which a concession was to be made, is it intended that force should be used or is Congress to remain powerless to execute its own decrees?”

As everybody knew, the proposal for a Congress fell through; but Lord Palmerston's words were applicable to the late Conference. Would the Government be able to shelter themselves much longer under the Treaty of 1856? It had been already broken by the Turks themselves, and as many persons in this country affirmed, would be shattered in pieces before very long. Events marched through Treaties, as was shown by the rapid formation of the Kingdom of Italy and the war between Germany and France. In both these cases the Treaties of Vienna fell to the ground. After all, what had the Treaty of 1856 done for the world, and what had the Ottoman Empire done for Europe? The Duke of Wellington, in a quotation which was read last week in “another place,” said in 1829—

“The Ottoman Empire stands not for the benefit of the Turks, but of Christian Europe—not to preserve the Mahomedans in power, but to save Christians from a war of which neither the objects could be defined, nor the extent nor the duration calculated.”

But had the Ottoman Empire saved the Christians from the losses and sufferings of the war of 1854? Had it saved them from the rebellions which had occurred in some of the Turkish Provinces, would it save us from the future war which was likely to occur? Had it given us peace and good government in the Christian Provinces of Turkey? Russia now held a very different position from that which she held in 1828-9, and again in 1854. Then she had her own quarrels to settle with the Porte. Now, she had both her own quarrels and those of Europe. She proposed to do our work and her own also. If the Government succeeded in preventing Russia from going to war, how would they deal with the unfortunate Christian subjects of the Porte? Would the Treaty of 1856 save us from war? He believed that Russia would move, and judging from what she had been able to do before, she would eventually find herself in possession of Roumelia. Looking at what might happen, he thought it only right that the Government should state what their course would be. The collapse of the Ottoman Empire was not likely to be far off, and on the whole there were many persons who thought that that would be a very good thing. The Duke of Wellington, speaking of the Treaty of Adrianople in 1829, said—

“There is no doubt that it would have been more fortunate for the world if the Treaty of Peace had not been signed, and if the Russians had entered Constantinople, and if the Turkish Empire had been dissolved.”

The Duke of Wellington thought that in such case the Five Powers would have entered into an engagement as to the disposition of Turkish territory, and that there would have been an assurance that the crumbling of Turkey would lead to no war, and to no such territorial accession to any State as would alter the general balance of power. He believed that many persons in this country would not be sorry to see the dissolution of the Ottoman Empire. The reforms conceded by Turkey might answer their purpose for a time, but after a time there was too much ground for supposing that they would lapse altogether. In conclusion he hoped, though he was not sanguine on this head, that in the future stages of the Ministerial policy, the whole country might be able to coincide with the Government.

The Duke of Westminster

LORD STANLEY OF ALDERLEY said, that he would not follow the noble Duke who spoke first through all the exaggerations of his speech, but he sincerely hoped that no more speeches in favour of coercion would be addressed to the House, for if any event such as Navarino were to take place, it would almost certainly be followed by an insurrection in India. The circumstances were now changed since Navarino, and made the danger greater, for at that time the whole of India was not under the British rule; there were not at that time either steam or telegraphic communications, and Sultan Mahmoud, from his innovations with respect to the Army, had lost the confidence of the Mussulman world. Violent speeches such as that of the noble Duke (the Duke of Argyll) a few nights ago, when pronounced by one who had been Secretary of State for India, would have a most dangerous effect, and were almost criminal. It might be that the noble Duke pinned his faith on the assertions of Sir George Campbell that the Indian Mussulmans did not care for the Ottoman Empire; but as Sir George Campbell was a personal Friend of his, and he had known him for more than 25 years, he should not be supposed to intend any discourtesy to him when he said that upon this particular point his opinion was of very little value, because in the earlier part of his career Sir George Campbell was employed in Ajmir among the Rajputs, and later in Bengal, where as he was too high an official, he had little or no opportunity of becoming acquainted with the feelings of the Mussulmans. When the noble Duke pleaded the right of insurrection, and incited subjects to rebel, it might be urged in extenuation of his language that Sir George Campbell had written in a widely circulated pamphlet, that whilst all the Christian Churches had preached subjection to the powers that be, the Scotch Church alone had taken an opposite course, and embraced the cause of freedom. The noble Duke opposite (the Duke of Westminster) who presided over the St. James's Hall Conference, and who appeared to believe everything that was related by the apostle of impalement (Canon Liddon), had denied that the revolt in Herzegovina was not a petty revolt, because the people there had preserved for 400 years ballads in favour of independence. Now, excepting the Poles, the Slavs possessed only one epic poem, the "Osmanita" of Gundulich, the poet of Ragusa, which was in praise of Sultan Osman. His reference to the Duke of Wellington's despatches was also unhappy, since those despatches published this morning in The Morning Post justified the conduct of the Government, and showed how factious was the Opposition. It appeared to be thought that the statement that Mr. Fox opposed Pitt and obtained for the Russians the cession of the fort of Otchakoff was an argument in favour of now supporting the ambitious designs of Russia. But the conduct of Mr. Fox in sending Sir Robert Adair to Russia to thwart Mr. Pitt's national policy had been considered not only as factious, but also as bordering on treason. And to state that he did so, only proved that "Vixere fortes ante Agamemnona," or that there had been other factious leaders of an Opposition before Mr. Gladstone.

THE MARQUESS OF BATH: My Lords, I do not rise to say whether or not the Government were half-hearted in the performance of the duties which they took upon themselves to maintain the peace of Europe and give security to the Christian inhabitants of Turkey: it is sufficient that Her Majesty's Government have acted in unison with the feelings of the country, and have shared the horrors experienced at the outrages committed by the Turks, and have recognized the insupportable character of the Turkish rule, and the little reliance which can be placed upon Turkish promises. The Government carried out those views in laying down the basis of the Conference, and in conjunction with the rest of the Powers had sought a remedy against the evils of Turkish misgovernment. The Conference has failed; but it has not failed for want of knowledge or devotion on the part of the noble Marquess (the Marquess of Salisbury) to the task he undertook: and I am bound to admit that, so far as the despatches enable us to judge, he has received the hearty and loyal support of his Colleagues. But the reason for the failure of the Conference, and the reason why the Turks rejected the proposals made to them, are not far to seek. In the first place, the Turks never believed that the European Powers would act together; and, above all, they did not realize the fact that the Government of England was in earnest on this question. We can also see, without much difficulty, why they distrusted or disbelieved in the sincerity of the English Government. Although the Turks are a half civilized or semi-barbarous race, they are by no means devoid of shrewdness and intellect, and when they read the accounts of the speeches that were made in public by supporters of the Government, almost up to the very last period at which the Conference was holding its sittings, and when they read the articles in the newspapers, which were supposed to be acting in the interests of the Government, advocating the interests of Turkey as if they were the interests of England, and defending the Turkish Ministers as if they were English Ministers, the Turks naturally came to the conclusion "there was a screw loose somewhere," and that the noble Marquess had not the full support of his Colleagues. There was another cause why the Turks were inclined to doubt the earnestness of England, and that was the unfortunate announcement of the Government in August that coercive measures were not to be used, and that moral suasion alone was to be employed. Now, I never knew that moral persuasion was good for anything unless it was to be backed up by something material. The Turks are quite intelligent enough to know how little value is to be placed on arguments so expressed. Another source of encouragement to the Turks in their resistance to the proposals of Europe, was the presence of Sir Henry Elliot at Constantinople. It is impossible to reconcile the policy advocated by Sir Henry Elliot as given in the Blue Books with the policy which was advocated by the noble Earl (the Secretary of State). When I look at the despatches of Sir Henry Elliot, and when I read the most remarkable addresses which were delivered to two deputations on his departure from Constantinople, I find it utterly and entirely impossible to reconcile the language of Sir Henry Elliot with the arguments which the noble Earl so sternly and so strenuously impressed upon the Porte. But the question which we have to consider is what is now to be done; and this is far more important than any criticism which can be offered on the past. Sir Henry Elliot speaks in his dispatches of the of the good feeling existing between the Turks and the Christians; but we have in the Blue Books the full complaints of their wrongs. Then there are the Greeks, whose unfortunate jealousy of the Slav populations affords Sir Henry Elliot so much pleasure, complaining of what is proposed to be done for the Bulgarians. We were told again by Mr. Baring who is borne out in his Report by almost all the Consuls, that the Turkish tyranny in the Provinces is insupportable, and that where there is Turkish rule there must be discontent and oppression. The people of Bulgaria are described as being driven into silence by terror or suffering, and the people of Bosnia preferred dying by hundreds, either of fever or hunger, in the maintenance of their opinions rather than accept Turkish fraternity. It is true the Porte has promulgated a Constitution; but what importance is to be attached to it remains yet to be seen. The noble Earl who has addressed us to-night spoke on the opening night of the Session as if he expected reforms to be made voluntarily by the Turks, and as if importance was to be attached to the promises of Turkey; but he must know perfectly that in years past reforms have been promised by Turkey which have never been carried into effect, and he must know how valueless anything she says will be if it is not accompanied by guarantees. The noble Earl spoke of peace as being of the first importance. Well, only let it be a peace which shall give security to the Christians for their lives and liberty. The question arises—Are matters to remain as they are, and are these people to be left in the condition in which they are described in the despatches? Are they to remain until Turkey puts an end to their miseries by further massacres, or a change in European politics enables some Power to advance to their rescue? I do not think they will have long to wait. The sympathies of the people, the solemn pledges of the Emperor, and the feelings of a kindred race and common faith must force Russia to act, and then the question is, When Russia interferes what policy is it incumbent on this country to pursue? I am happy to think there seems to be little chance for any statesman in England to force us into war for the maintenance of Turkish power or rule. But if this country remains neutral in a war between Russia and Turkey what will happen? There will be fresh massacres and fresh miseries and sufferings for the Christians as well as the Turks. If Russia were successful, the settlement of the question would be left with her, and the whole power of protecting English interests would, at any rate, be much diminished, and Russian power would increase. Where such a state of things would end it is impossible for any man to foretell. There are other elements of danger in Europe beside the Eastern Question. There is another Power more aggressive than Russia awaiting its opportunity. Do not believe that it is merely the ill-disciplined and ill-officered troops that are the only difficulties which check at this moment Russian advance. These difficulties can be overcome, and by Russia they must be overcome, but I do not think the outcome will be very conducive to the peace of Europe. Now, if this country, instead of pursuing a policy of neutrality, goes in cordially with Russia or any other European Power in coercing the Turks, and forcing upon them such an alteration in their internal administration as may give contentment to the people and security to the peace of Europe—if this country is prepared to do that, if a war is not altogether avoided it will be, if it arises, of very short duration. The Turks cannot contend at the same time with a Russian army and an English fleet, and such a course would leave them still open to take such measures as the interests of England required for resisting Russian aggression. For the interest and honour of England, in the interest of the peace of Europe, and in the interest of common Christianity itself, it is wise that this country should not remain passive, but should take such measures as would at the same time protect her own interests and do justice to the feelings of outraged humanity.

LORD CAMPBELL: My Lords, the noble Marquess who has just sat down (the Marquess of Bath) has revealed with an astounding frankness the programme of those who wish to invade the Porte for the advantage of its subjects, and who have in the noble Duke from whom the Motion came so prominent a Leader. Whatever may be thought of the course the noble Duke has taken, or the language he has used, to one kind of praise he is entitled—the praise of absolute consistency upon the Eastern Question. The noble Duke has not frequently addressed the House or other audiences upon it. He made a speech during the Cretan Insurrection which he appears to have entirely forgotten, together with the events which drew it forth; as he maintained to-night that the Sublime Porte since the Crimean War had been enjoying absolute repose. That speech is said to be remarkable for its declamatory eloquence; but it provoked the severe censure of the late Lord Derby, who had as Prime Minister to notice it, on the ground that it was calculated, proceeding from a quarter so authoritative, to promote the fall of the Ottoman Empire, which could not be conveniently replaced. Last autumn the noble Duke joined an agitation—and I agree with him that public meetings upon foreign questions may be occasionally, although they cannot often, be excused—an agitation of which the avowed tendency was not only to coerce the Porte, but to dislodge it. On the 8th of February the noble Duke electrified mankind. Your Lordships, as he explained, being an “European house-top,” when he rises to address you by the statement that all insurrections against the Porte are justifiable, no matter what their object or their origin; and that the Sultan is not entitled to the allegiance of his subjects. And here one cannot help remarking how consummate is the wisdom, how deep the statesmanship to which men may gradually arrive if they are only long enough surrounded by a Council. The mind of the noble Duke, extensive as it is, could not alone have seized a truth so hidden and so priceless. To-day, the noble Duke comes down to explain that Great Britain ought to go to war with a Power she is bound by Treaty to defend. These four speeches might all be brought together. Their harmony is perfect. But I am not convinced that their author will be accepted as a fair exponent of Liberal opinion on the subject, or as an organ of the Party which Lord Palmerston directed in the path of reforming and upholding that Empire, which the noble Duke may possibly destroy, but which after the language he has held he retains a slender prospect of ameliorating. There seem to be but two considerations urged in favour of a policy so violent. One that the Porte has assumed an indefensible position in resisting the last suggestions of the Conference; the other that unless coercion of some kind happens, the labours of the Conference are sterile, while it is incumbent on the State to render them productive. It would not be convenient now to approach so large a question as the policy or impolicy of what the Conference agreed in finally maintaining. The vindication of the Porte has been delivered in a shape the most official and elaborate—it has been delivered in their Circular of the 25th of January. Has the noble Duke replied to it? I am not aware that he alluded to it. There never was a State Paper more entitled to attention, in point of dignity, of moderation, and of argument. Those who do not take the trouble to confront it, have no kind of locus standi against the Power whose conclusion it defends. As to the second point, admitting that the labours of the Conference were bound to be productive, they may easily be shown to have been far less sterile than the noble Duke imagines. They did much to prevent the occupation of Bulgaria, which hung over Europe as a menace in the middle of the autumn. Their influence no doubt advanced the measure of the Turkish Constitution. Besides, they brought about—although without design—an interregnum of diplomacy upon the Bosphorus. For this result alone the noble Marquess the late Plenipotentiary would be entitled to the lasting gratitude of the people whom he visited. To explain the impression thoroughly is not consistent with the reticence I should desire to preserve, in spite of rather opposite examples, but noble Lords can reason for themselves upon it and judge how far it is well-founded. Having alluded to the Turkish Constitution, I cannot help referring to a most extraordinary statement with regard to it, which during the Session has come from the Bench beneath, and which tends to give a pretext to that aggression on the Porte to which we are invited. It has been denounced as a political manœuvre, improvised to baffle the united delegates of Europe. To such a version I am not disqualified for giving an emphatic contradiction. During the autumn of 1875, when no Conference was meditated, the friends of

Midhat Pasha had resolved to advocate a system of this character. That distinguished man withdrew from office, because his programme of reform was then deemed unacceptable. It fell to my lot to approach him during his retreat, sufficiently to know that whenever he again directed public matters some kind of Constitution must arise to check the power of the Sultan. If no insurrection had taken place in Herzegovina, if we had never heard of an Andrassy Note or Berlin Memorandum, the set of men whom I allude to would some day have enforced the convictions they had gradually arrived at. The version I protest against is more extraordinary when it comes from men who aspire to be the Representatives of Liberal opinion in the country. Sympathy with nascent Constitutions, imperfect as they may be, untried as they must be, is among the permanent traditions of the Party. Such Constitutions have always been the object of lenient criticism, of prompt support, of generous encouragement among the Party from the days of Mr. Fox to our own. Those who now deride them and discredit them forget the essence of the school in which they call themselves the Leaders. I will not detain your Lordships, I rose only because the speech of the noble Duke appeared to me to be calculated to promote hostilities, unless on this side of the House it was in some degree resisted. The noble Duke demands aggression on the Porte. Might he not insist upon a war with Portugal? Portugal is not less ancient an ally. Might he not require an expedition against Belgium? We are but bound by Treaty to defend her. According to this system, when we have decimated our allies, should we proceed to act against our Colonies? Would a campaign against the West Indies be sufficient for the noble Duke; or would nothing less than a coup de main against the executive and Parliament of Ottawa content him? If Great Britain is to be arrayed against the Ottoman Empire, how soon may we expect a dangerous expedition from the North, of which the noble Duke would be the leader. These propositions are not much more violent than that which he has heard—and scarcely more irrational. If you really want to effect certain changes in European Turkey, the path is clear; the means are tangible before you. The

Lord Campbell

British Embassy when properly restored has only to assert superiority to every other influence based on your fidelity to Treaties—which since Lord Stratford de Redcliffe left Constantinople it has never done—and there is not a single feasible idea in the Imperial decree of 1839, or that of 1856, or that of 1875, which may not be translated into practice. By going back to duty, you may reach the point the noble Duke would gain by moving forward to perdition. My Lords, in a few days I hope to bring before the House a Motion which aims at peace as decidedly as that of the noble Duke aspires to a rupture. I venture to engage the noble Lords who are opposed to me to deliver their speeches now, and those who think as I do to reserve them to the time when they may influence your Lordships.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: My Lords, I trust I shall not be deemed presumptuous in addressing your Lordships' House on this question, inasmuch as I held a subordinate position connected with the Foreign Office during the Crimean War, and it was my lot to be sent to Russia to watch over the execution of the Treaty by which it was concluded. I am anxious to say a few words, because I wish to place the question upon the basis of the general policy of this country in the East. I agree with my noble Friend who opened this discussion (the Duke of Argyll) in his horror and detestation of the atrocities that have been committed in Bulgaria, and if that horror and detestation could be increased it would be by the cynical Memorandum of the Turkish Minister, which I have read with disgust. But however great and just the influence of these feelings has been on public opinion in this country, we must judge this great question mainly with reference to our permanent interests in the Levant. English interests in the Eastern Question are great and abiding, and are not to be affected by passing events, however shocking. I may be, perhaps, somewhat old-fashioned in my views, but I hold the doctrine that it is the interest of this country not to be indifferent to a change which would throw the Turkish dominion into the hands of any European Power. Next to Egypt we have, I think, the greatest interest in Constantinople, which ought not to be allowed to fall into the hands of any preponde-rant Power, for that would impair our position in the Mediterranean and might threaten the security of our communication with India. But while holding these views, I must say that while our interests are abiding, and the ends to which our policy must be directed remain the same, the means must be changed from time to time as the circumstances and conditions of the Levant alter. Now what I think may be charged against Her Majesty's Government is that they have not evinced an adequate perception of the change of circumstances and have been too slow, to adapt themselves to the new policy required. We have no need to turn our back upon our old policy in the East, of which the most typical representative was Lord Palmerston, who, while he steadily maintained the independence of Turkey, strenuously urged on the Porte to reform its administration and secure justice and good treatment to the Christian population. Lord Stratford de Redcliffe also was unsparing in his denunciation of Turkish misrule, and resorted even to what was sometimes called "bullying" to obtain his ends; and Lord Stratford was succeeded by Ministers who pursued a similar course, upholding the independence of Turkey while endeavouring to secure the reform of its Government. In this respect the policy of this country has been consistent—namely, on the one hand to uphold the integrity and independence of Turkey, and on the other to improve the condition of the Christian subjects of the Sultan. It appears to me that the question the Government had originally to consider was whether this was a question of intervention or non-intervention. Talleyrand said he did not believe in the existence of what was called a policy of non-intervention, because a country would change its policy whenever its interests required it. You cannot lay down a fixed rule either for intervention or non-intervention, but must adapt yourselves to circumstances; and it seems to me the Government did not, from the first, form a clear and distinct idea whether they would adopt an intervention or a non-intervention policy. The impression produced by reading the Papers, confirmed by the speech of the Foreign Secretary this evening, is that the Government thought at first that it would be better to abstain altogether from interference, fearing that they should only promote the designs of Russia if they took a decided part. In regarding the insurrection as a petty outbreak, it seems to me that they overlooked the serious elements and the seeds of future disorder which were recognized by other statesmen, whose apprehensions were fully expressed in the Andrassy Note. If the Government had appreciated the fact that the circumstances of Turkey were such as to require energy and promptitude, there would have been less risk of what the noble Earl (the Earl of Derby) called a petty insurrection, resulting in a general war. Sir Henry Elliot, in his despatches laid down in the plainest manner the right of interference—and in mentioning Sir Henry's name I must say I think he has been hardly used in these discussions. I have read his despatches with great interest, and, as far as I can judge, he appears to have done his duty faithfully to the Government, and to have dealt with considerable ability with the delicate matters with which he had to deal. The matter appeared to have presented itself to the Government at that time as one in which it was not necessary for them to interfere; and so it went on until the Berlin Memorandum was submitted, and that appears to have been a turning point in these transactions. I am far from saying that the Government ought to have accepted the terms of that Memorandum; but instead of entirely rejecting it, they should have made some proposal of their own, and thus have taken the opportunity of placing this country in the foremost place; and I believe there would have been no indisposition on the part of any of the Powers fairly to consider any proposition emanating from the English Government. Unfortunately, it chanced about this time that the English Fleet was sent to Besika Bay. The noble Earl (the Earl of Derby) has given us the assurance that the Fleet was sent there for the protection of the Christians and with that assurance I am perfectly content; but the coincidence was unfortunate, for the Turks imagined that the Fleet had come to give them protection against the demands which might be made upon them by the other Powers. Then there came the change over the minds and councils of the Government. I do not make that a matter of reproach—I do not blame them for the change which came over their councils—it came about naturally and at a very opportune moment. They were applied to by the Prince of Servia for their good offices in procuring an armistice, and they took the plain, distinct, and direct course—they applied to the Porte for an armistice; and if Sir Henry Elliot had been instructed to use a little stronger language he would, no doubt, have succeeded, without allowing Russia to have the credit of obtaining it. Then they made the proposal for a Conference. The noble Earl the Secretary of State tells us that the Conference has not been unattended with satisfactory results, inasmuch as, on the one side, Turkey has gained a respite, and, on the other, the demands upon Turkey have been so minimized that they are much more easy of acceptance. But, on the other hand, it has given Russia time to complete her warlike preparations. However that may be, I wish to point out that in agreeing to this Conference it would have been wise to consider what should be done in case the proposals made by the Conference were entirely rejected by the Porte. When it comes to such a formal demonstration as a Conference, I think the dignity of the Powers requires that you should have some definite notion of the manner in which the proposals you have to lay before the Power, whose affairs you are considering are to be enforced, in the event of your proposals being rejected. As it was, the Conference had only the motive power of Russian arms behind it, and it was therefore doing what the Crimean War was undertaken to prevent—namely, giving Russia the position of the only Power to interfere authoritatively in the affairs of Turkey. The Government might have foreseen the possibility of failure, and that it might be necessary not to exclude from consideration the possibility of their taking part against the Porte. In these despatches there is a great deal too much of the contingent policy of inaction. If it is imprudent to announce a contingent policy of action, it is still more mischievous to announce a contingent policy of inaction, just as it is more difficult to prove a negative than an affirmative—there is declaration after declaration that in no case would they interfere, whereas the question of interference should have been left to be determined as the necessity of the case might require. These repeated declarations unnecessarily hamper your hands, and it was a great imprudence on the part of the noble Earl to heap up the repeated announcements that this country would not act either on one side or the other. I regretted to hear the noble Earl repeat some of those declarations again to-night. In my humble opinion our interests in Turkey might possibly require our active interference. It may not be at this moment advisable; but the statesmen who formerly conducted our policy would never have made such statements as those of the noble Earl as to non-interference. In 1827, Canning—no mean statesman—did not shrink from active interference in the affairs of the Levant. In 1841, although the intervention was directed specially to Egypt, Lord Palmerston did not shrink from it; and since the Treaty of 1856 was concluded, there has been distinct armed interference by means of the French troops in 1860. All these instances show that cases may arise in which force might be necessary. I find, in looking through the Blue Books, that none of the other Powers have made these contingent declarations. Neither Russia, nor Austria, nor Germany has made such declarations, and I do not see why England should have done so. At this moment, with the Russian army massed on the frontier, and the Turks also in a state of military preparation, I wish not to say anything which would imply a desire to embarrass the Government—they have a most delicate and difficult duty to perform: but I hope from what the noble Earl said this evening, that at all events he has not given up diplomatic activity—that he is not holding his hands—but that he is endeavouring in concert with the other Powers, even at the last moment, to bring Turkey to her senses. That he will be successful in doing so we cannot be sanguine. The mission of the noble Marquess (the Marquess of Salisbury) has been conducted with great ability; yet, notwithstanding that ability, it has failed. If the noble Earl is more successful, I shall be highly gratified; but I do not augur well of his success from what he said in regard to the Constitution which has been proclaimed in Constantinople. If I had wished for any argument to prove how vain were the hopes held out by that Constitution, I should not have desired to see them placed in a clearer light than in the despatch of the noble Marquess. I do not believe in the constitutional reforms of the Porte, though I believe that something might be accomplished if guarantees had been obtained by the Powers. But after 20 years' experience of the Porte, and looking to the bankrupt condition of the country and her statesmen, we cannot build much hope on the spontaneous efforts of the Porte itself. The course of events has been to throw the matter again into the hands of Russia, and to create a similar state of difficulty to that which existed before the Crimean War. I have no exceptional distrust of Russia, nor do I feel called on to place implicit confidence in her; but if the state of affairs in Constantinople is restored to what it was before the Crimean War, we may look to forward to such a complete upset in the whole condition of the Levant as will be conducive neither to the interests of this country, nor to the peace of Europe.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: My Lords, the speech of the noble Earl who has just sat down (the Earl of Kimberley) was marked by great judgment and moderation, and in that respect presented a marked difference to the speech by which the present debate was opened. But though there was much difference in the fervour of the sentiments and the moderation of the language of the two speakers on the other side, the principal difference in the sentiment appears to be this—the noble Duke (the Duke of Argyll) blames us for not coercing Turkey; the noble Earl is so far from blaming us for that—he blames us for not having said that we intended to coerce. Now, does the noble Earl think so meanly of the diplomatists of Europe, or even of the diplomatists of Turkey, as to imagine that they would not have seen through such a flimsy pretence. This country works in a glass hive—all the sentiments of its public men are well known; and if any doubt as to our policy exists while Parliament is sitting, Questions can always be asked, and during the Recess deputations can be sent to the Foreign Office; so that there is no possibility of concealing the sentiments of the Government. On any vital point of English policy secrecy is non-existent. Therefore, any attempt to conduct our negotiations, as the noble Earl indicated, in such a way as that while all the time firmly intending not to coerce, we should conceal that intention altogether from the world, would have been far beyond our honesty, and certainly beyond our power. Both the noble Lords, however, have shown a true appreciation of the real nature of this question, and the real origin of the difficulties that surround us, by going back to the policy of the Crimean War. There is no doubt that to the way in which that policy was carried out the difficulties we have now to contend with are due. I do not blame the statesmen of that day for not foreseeing what was to happen; but I say that we are now reaping the harvest which they then sowed, and that we have to bear the difficulties, and in some respects the odium, for which they are responsible. They attempted what, in the nature of things, was impossible to achieve. They endeavoured to prevent Russia from reducing Turkey to a state of dependence by means of assumed claims over a certain portion of the subjects of Turkey. That certainly was a pretension injurious to the interests of other Powers, and contrary to the policy of Europe. But that six European Powers should undertake the tutelage of the subject population of Turkey and exercise that tutelage, not only by remonstrances, but in case of need by united naval and military action, was a chimera which it is difficult to understand how any one who has studied the history of the world could entertain. The thing was impossible. It was a matter of absolute certainty that when it came to the test, and the six Powers had to carry out that policy, some of them for good reasons or bad, others from circumstances arising out of the state of affairs, would decline the task, and then the united tutelage of the six Powers would be at an end. In that case the position of things would be as my noble Friend (the Earl of Kimberley) said, not very different from what it was at the time of the Crimean War—that is, the real influence over Turkey would fall, as it necessarily must, to that Power which was prepared to fight on behalf of the subject races of Turkey. The problem which the Crimean War attempted to solve was an impossibility. That was the origin of all our troubles, and the attempt was made, not because Lord Clarendon and Lord Palmerston thought the time would come when the six Powers would have to march into the field to undertake the tutelage of the subject populations, but because they entertained an entirely false idea of the probable reform and progress of the Ottoman Empire. They indulged in an optimism which was perfectly pardonable at the time, but which has been belied by subsequent events—they thought that Turkey would reform herself—and long experience has proved that Turkey will not reform herself. But, my Lords, there is no break in the continuous responsibility of the Governments by which this country is ruled, and it is not open to any one Party or set of men holding office together to renounce the lines of policy laid down by their Predecessors, or treat past events as though they had not occurred. We, like the other Governments which came after the Crimean War, were bound to accept the consequence of that war, to accept the Treaty by which it was concluded, and to maintain the attitude and act in the spirit of those transactions which dictated it. In the Treaty of 1856, the intention of Turkey to reform herself was recognized in the most solemn manner, and each of the Powers for itself—I am not now speaking of their mutual obligations—guaranteed in the most distinct manner to observe the integrity and independence of the Ottoman Empire. That Treaty was signed by the Government of which the noble Duke (the Duke of Argyll) was a Member. Pass from that to the summer of 1875. A rebellion breaks out in the Turkish Empire. My noble Friend (the Earl of Derby) speaks of not fostering that rebellion and inviting sympathizers from outside to keep it up; and then he is denounced by the very men who signed the Treaty of 1856 as though he had committed some great crime, not only against international law, but against public morality. I acknowledge the difficulty that surrounds the Treaty of 1856—I admit how much events have modified the interpretation we are to put on that Treaty; but that at the beginning of these events it should be laid as a matter of blame against my noble Friend that he did not trample under foot a solemn guarantee into which his country had entered, and that that blame should have been levelled against him by one of the very Ministers who gave that guarantee was a very extraordinary circumstance. It was in the same spirit that the subsequent action towards Turkey was conceived. It soon became evident that the sanguine hopes of 1856 would not be realized, and that the exact attitude of this country towards Turkey could not remain what it was in 1856; but were we bound, were we justified in at once turning round upon our ancient ally, who had rested upon us so long and who had been encouraged by our acts and words? Would it have been just and straightforward in us suddenly to assume an attitude which would have been hard even on the part of Russia? If it was to be so—if the alliance was to be broken up—if the terrible events which took place within its borders were to have the effect of alienating the undoubted affection entertained by this country towards Turkey—surely it was our duty that we should struggle to the last against the change which forced upon us, at all events, a new and unexpected interpretation of a Treaty to which our country was pledged? Surely it was our duty to exhaust appeal, remonstrance, and exhortation? It was our duty to be the last of the nations to desert the cause which we had formerly maintained; and if you had taken any other course, the Turks, however low you may put their intelligence, however deep you think their guilt is dyed, would have had fair ground of complaint against this country. That principle is the explanation of our policy. We have changed, as my right hon. Friend (the Chancellor of the Exchequer) said in the other House, in the sense of the man who has put on his great coat in winter and taken it off in summer has become inconsistent. We have changed in so far as we were forced by the events and changing circumstances of the world; but we have not deserted our traditional alliance without hesitation and without sorrow; and we shall cling to the hope that some change may occur in the Councils of Turkey which may bring back that alliance into the same state that it was before. That, my Lords, is the reason why we went into the Conference—distinctly not as a preliminary to force, but as a means of peaceable persuasion. It necessarily followed, as the noble Earl (the Earl of Kimberley) has said, that Russia was the motive power of the Conference. That is not the way in which I should prefer to phrase it, but at the same time I do not absolutely deny that it is true in a sense. It is true that we went into the Conference first of all to restore peace between Turkey and Servia and Montenegro, and then to obtain good government for the Turkish Provinces; but undoubtedly we also went into the Conference to stop a great and menacing danger—namely, the prospect of a war between Russia and Turkey. This, then, being the evil which we came to avert, it naturally was in pointing out that evil that our moral influence on the Porte rested. We said to Turkey—"Unless you do this or that, this terrible danger, which may well involve the loss of your Empire is ready to fall upon you; we hope that our influence and advice may be able to avert it—indeed, we come here for that purpose—but we warn you that we shall accept no responsibility for the future if you treat our advice with disdain." Undoubtedly it was in this sense true that the fear of the result of a rupture of the Conference—the fear of a breach with Russia—was the motive force of the Conference. It seems to me, as it must to everybody else, that the refusal of the Turks is a mystery, for the infatuation of that course seems to be so tremendous. I observe that the wonder at their conduct has been very general, for all kinds of excellent and extraordinary reasons have been suggested to explain it. To myself it certainly appears that one of the causes which led the Turks to this unfortunate resolution was the belief which has been so sedulously fostered, I know not by whom, but by irresponsible advisers, that the power of Russia was rotten, that the armies of Russia were suffering from disease, that the mobilization of the army had failed, and that, consequently, the fear of war was idle. They counted upon every possible contingency. Their traditional policy had been to maintain themselves by the division of the Powers, and they imagined that the Powers would still be divided and that a general European war would save them. Still, with reference to the observation of the noble Earl, it is right to say that although it is true in one sense that the fear of the possibility of a breach with Russia was the greatest motive force which could be expected to operate on the

Turks, yet there was no difference in the language of the Plenipotentiaries on the question of coercion. Of course, I did not use any threat of coercion; neither did the Ambassador of Russia. I do not think that from beginning to end I heard anything which could be fairly said to be a threat of coercion in case the Porte did not accept the recommendations of the Conference. That is, I think, a consideration of some importance. When questions of personal and national honour may have consequences more tremendous to human happiness than perhaps they ever had before, it is important that it should be on record that, at least, as far as the proceedings of the Conference went, there was not anything which pledged Russia to take military action in case the recommendations were not accepted by the Porte. Now, my Lords, the noble Duke (the Duke of Argyll) still blames us because we refused to follow up the rejection of our proposals by coercion; and when I tell the noble Duke that he has not rightly established in his own mind what coercion is, he meets it, as I fully expected, not only with a flat contradiction, but he tells me that what I suppose to be coercion is not the coercion he proposes—that the sending out of a fleet is not the coercion he suggested, and that there are half-a-dozen ways of coercion which are more effective and more desirable than that. I listened to the noble Duke with the most rapt attention, because that was the one solution which, reflecting in my own mind, I had been unable to attain, and I was anxious to learn from the ingenious mind of the noble Duke the other means of coercion that remained. But my expectations were doomed to disappointment. In this strange discussion the parts of Government and Opposition are entirely changed. The Government have been all candour. Their candour can be weighed in ounces. We have absolutely poured the records of our thoughts and proceedings on the Table of the House. But for the life of us we cannot yet get from the Opposition, which is usually so frank, because it is free from responsibility, any statement of their opinion or their desires. All through the autumn they have been longing for the meeting of Parliament—they have been urging that we should summon Parliament before the close of the usual Recess. The one thing necessary for their happiness was that Parliament should meet, in order that they might challenge the proceedings of an inhuman and detestable Government and bring them into accordance with the feelings of the people. Now Parliament has met, and butter will not melt in their mouths. We cannot induce them by any request, however humble and however modestly worded, to place on the Journals, in the form of a distinct opinion, the grounds on which they censure our policy and the reasons why they pursued us with every kind of vituperation their vocabulary contains during three long months. And now the noble Duke pursues the same policy. Our fault is that we did not adopt a policy of coercion. We say, "What is coercion?" "Ah!" says the noble Duke, "that is telling." The noble Duke is not going to be so indiscreet. He will blame us for not giving ourselves up to his word "coercion," but no force—not even wild horses—shall draw from him what the meaning of coercion is. Not having been able therefore to find any adversary to grapple with, I must again venture to remind the House what our position in respect to coercion is. Coercion is of two kinds. There is a real coercion when you take a man's arms and legs and make him do what you want him to do; and there is a moral coercion when you threaten to flog or to kill him if he will not do what you want him to do. The two Powers adjoining Turkey might exercise the first kind of coercion. They could pour their armies into the Turkish territory and make the authorities in Turkey do that which otherwise they would decline to do. That is the first and obvious and comparatively easy mode of coercion. The other four Powers of Europe have not that opportunity. Some of them, like ourselves, want a sufficient army, and others a sufficient navy, while all probably want sufficient money. The occupation of Turkey, I should say, would probably be within the reach of the two Powers, if any great national interest dictated such an occupation; but it could only be effected at a cost which nothing but the most vital national necessity could justify. The other four Powers are limited to coercion by means of fear. We can threaten to destroy Turkey; we can threaten to punish her, if she does not accept the proposition which we have suggested to her. I do not see any mode of threatening or punishing her so simple as by taking up a fleet to the Bosphorus, if not by burning down Stamboul; but I confess I should not look to the prospect with anything like equanimity. What should have we done when Stamboul has been burnt? We should have destroyed the only Government which now keeps some thirty millions of people in some kind of order. Are we prepared to take the responsibility of the government of these people? That would be a very grave responsibility. But then I am met with the statement that there is another mode of reasoning. It said that when our fleet is opposite Stamboul the Turks will immediately yield. Nay, some people are so sanguine as to think that as soon as the six Powers announced their intention of resorting to coercion the Turks would yield. Before I went on this mission it was said that they would yield when the six Powers announced that they had agreed on their recommendations. I was always very sceptical as to this. The noble Duke seemed to laugh at me for starting on a mission which was foredoomed to failure; but I may remark that I had a very strong belief that I would fail when I left the shores of England. I thought that the differences among the Powers were so great that the chances of coming to an agreement were infinitesimally small; but for the reason I have dwelt upon when referring to the Treaty of 1856, we thought it was the duty of the Government to exhaust every contrivance in order to bring the Turks to a sense of the danger of their position. We thought it was the duty of us all to assist in that endeavour. But I should shrink from being associated with a policy which trusted for its success entirely to the probability of the Turks yielding to threats. I should be sorry—I should shrink—from being associated with such a policy, not merely because the Turks are a very courageous race, but because the question of yielding is not in the hands of those who are the most deeply interested in the prosperity of Turkey. The Government of that country is entirely dependent on the strength and power of the Sultan. There is no aristocracy, there is no governing class, there is no

organized democracy, there is no representative Government. There are two foundations only—Religion and the Sultan. The power of the Sultan is something which cannot here be discussed in great detail; but it must be obvious that a Sultan who succeeds to two other Sultans who have been removed by revolutionary power in a few months does not inherit all the attributes and all the autocracy of his Predecessors. And the religion is in the hands of men who are largely responsible for those revolutions, whose sincerity and devotion to their country cannot be questioned, but whose ignorance of European affairs and all that statemanship implies, and of the political circumstances and prospects of their own country, is absolute and complete. You have nothing to appeal to. You appeal to the Sultan. He is afraid of revolution. You appeal to the Revolution. It has not the faculties to listen to you. Therefore, any Ministry which attempted the policy of coercion, as I have defined it—that is to say, any Ministry which went to Constantinople with the hope of producing good government there by sheer threats—must fail. I should not say that in the case of any country such a policy was a hopeful one—I should not say it was a policy sustained by the experience of the world as successful; but in the case of Turkey I should say it was foredoomed to certain and absolute failure. The noble Duke has practically made this point the turning point of his speech. When he asked us whether we were still pursuing the policy contained in my Instructions, of course he must well know that but one reply could be given. He must know that we shall pursue that policy as long as it can be pursued. Our policy is simply this—to try by all peaceable means in our power to induce Turkey to open her eyes to the danger which surrounds her, to awake from her infatuation, and give to the poor populations which have suffered so much some measure of liberty and safety for life and honour. But we do not yet despair. There can be no question that—I do not say it to his dishonour, for I do not doubt he was inspired by the most patriotic motives—the main adversary of the late Conference is the man who has fallen from power. It is fair that we should assume, until we know to the contrary, that the Sultan in making this change has been actuated by a desire to draw nearer to the wishes of the European Powers. At all events, it is open to us to cherish that hope. We feel that the destinies of Turkey are now in the hands of men who are not pledged as a matter of consistency and honour to any opposition to, at least, the substance of the reforms which we have tried to induce them to adopt. We hope that if the substance of these reforms is adopted there is no Power in Europe which will think itself either bound or justified in trying to cut this knotty question by the sword. Our efforts have not been wanting, and are not wanting still, to awaken the Turks to the danger to which they were so blind; because if this question once comes into a military phase—if once the Powers of Europe are assured that there is no hope of preventing a war in South-eastern Europe, and if once they have to decide upon the state of things that shall be so produced, there is every reason to fear that the very energy of the considerations which have induced them now to strain every effort to avert a war will rather lead them in the future to say “This question must be settled once for all, so that no future war shall occur.” That is the danger—the tremendous danger—which threatens the Turkish Empire and which we hope to avert. It is still our hope that within the brief time—it may be—of respite, the Porte may be guided by wiser counsels, and in giving the barest rights to those who have suffered so long under its dominion, it will open an era of fairer hope and nobler prosperity to one of the most ancient Empires of the world.

THE EARL OF DUDLEY said, that in venturing to follow the noble Marquess, he must first observe that he had never heard it suggested that we should turn round upon those whom we supported and forget existing obligations. He thought the Government had taken a straightforward and consistent course, in admitting our position in reference to the Treaty obligations; and no Government, whatever its home politics, could have taken any other course. England existed by Treaties, and if she wished to retain her influence in the world, it must be by showing that she was the first to respect Treaties. He was, however, sorry to hear the noble Earl say that it was not the policy of this country to resort to coercion in reference to Turkey. In his view their Lordships were not assembled there to review the conduct of the Government and to bring home to them any shortcomings in the past, but to ascertain what was to be the future of this great question. It did not matter whether the Government had been thoroughly consistent or not, or whether they had changed their policy—he held that they had done nothing of the sort, but had pursued a consistent policy up to the present moment; but he regretted that the Government had not insisted upon their Representatives in Turkey sending home the fullest information, and had not disclosed this information. If this course had been taken, and if the Government had been frank with Parliament and the country, all that was now being said in February might have been said in July. As it was, Parliament had separated without the information that was wanted and thus arose the demand for an autumn Session. It had been said that to hold an autumn Session would inconvenience everybody; but there were times when inconvenience was a matter of no moment. Why, then, was not Parliament called together in the autumn to settle this question? From first to last there had been a disinclination to look into the treatment of her Christian Provinces by Turkey, which was the main point upon which the nation was so deeply stirred. It had been stated in a recent pamphlet that Russia was the sole obstacle to the settlement of this question; and he agreed with this view, though not on the grounds stated by the writer. The reason why Russia had been an obstacle to a settlement of the question was that for years past there had been such an unfounded jealousy of her as to prevent anything like cordial co-operation between her and the other European Powers who were interested in the matter. He believed that if certain Provinces were removed from the power of Turkey and she were only allowed to exercise a nominal sovereignty, there would be no further difficulty. He could only attach one definition to the word coercion; and that was involved in the question of what should be done with a country which had refused assent to all the moral suasion that had been brought to bear upon it. Let Turkey remain as it was, if that was thought best; but do not let the Christian subjects of the Porte remain longer in the miserable position they had so long occupied among the peoples of the world. Turkey had done nothing to show that she had the least intention of changing her policy, and he had no doubt that in the event of any future outbreak among her subjects it would be suppressed with all the nameless horrors which had in former times been committed with the consent, if not at the instigation, of the Turkish Government. So far as he was concerned he should be satisfied if Her Majesty's Government went back to what the Berlin Memorandum proposed; and he regretted that they did not accept it at the time. If no further steps were to be taken after the way in which the Porte had treated the Conference, he could only say that diplomacy had received a check from which it could never recover. He doubted whether any of the Powers who had been parties to the Treaty guaranteeing the independence of Turkey would put their forces in the field to maintain the independence of a Power whose bonds were as worthless as their spoken words.

EARL GRANVILLE: My Lords, I have no doubt that the noble Earl opposite (the Earl of Beaconsfield), who the other evening expressed his impatience to meet the noble Duke beside me in debate, is wishful to encounter a foeman worthy of his steel; and I will, therefore, now address to your Lordships the few remarks I think it necessary to make, in order that the noble Earl may not have to speak at a late hour. At the outset I wish to make two admissions of a very commonplace character. In the first place, I wish to admit that the noble Earl the Foreign Secretary and his Colleagues have had a most difficult and complicated question to deal with; and, in the second place, I wish, while denying that they have a right to claim a monopoly of feeling in reference to this matter, to admit that they have been actuated not only by a desire for the honour and interests of this country, but also for its fair fame. At the same time, I must deny the right of the noble Earl to find fault with us for criticizing, by the light of more recent occurrences, a Blue Book which was published at a time of the year when it was most inconvenient for us to discuss the blots we found in it, and two months after the time at which there existed the least necessity for withholding it from publication. Something has been said about the change which has been made by the Government from their first policy. That change may have arisen from altered circumstances, or it may have occurred, as the noble Earl the Prime Minister very candidly said at Aylesbury, in consequence of the fact that the policy of the Government was not receiving the support of the country. At any rate, a change of opinion was effected, and I do not quarrel with Her Majesty's Government for having, in the first instance, followed the line of policy which resulted from the Crimean War, though, after the demonstration made by the noble Marquess opposite (the Marquess of Salisbury) of the folly and the impotent character of that policy, I am certainly surprised that his Colleagues not only followed generally in the same line, but strained it to an extent almost unprecedented. Putting aside the question of the public mind having been excited by the Bulgarian atrocities, they seem to ignore all the circumstances of misgovernment which had created a state of things in Turkey likely to lead to most dangerous results, and which could only be met by a hearty and energetic union on the part of the great European Powers. I rejoice in their change of policy; although, instead of being pursued with the zeal of converts, the Ministry have shown an amount of irresolution and indecision in carrying out the policy, which is, perhaps, not unnatural in those who lead a Party, many Members of which do not approve it. With regard to the construction of Treaties, I will not deny the claim for candour which was made by the noble Marquess opposite on behalf of the Government; but I must say that it was a strange kind of candour which induced the noble Earl the Foreign Secretary in writing to our Ambassador at Constantinople with reference to the Tripartite Treaty to lay it down that, on the one hand, we were bound at the call of any of our co-signatories to come to the rescue of Turkey, and, on the other, that it was impossible for England to obey the Treaty obligations. My object is to inquire whether it is not possible, even at this moment, to take steps to ascertain from the co-signatories to that Treaty whether by mutual consent we could not be relieved from such obligations as these. I do not wish to follow all the details which have been so deeply gone into already, and which were more or less answered by the noble Earl. I come at once to the particular Notice by my noble Friend (the Duke of Argyll) with reference to the Conference. I remember, when the noble Marquess was about to go, or had just gone on his special embassy, that the Chancellor of the Exchequer, in one of the numerous speeches he made in the country, stated that the noble Marquess had started with the full confidence of his Colleagues and of the country. I believe that with regard to the country that was perfectly true. But the Chancellor of the Exchequer stated that the noble Marquess had gone out with a full knowledge of the views of his Colleagues. Now, if the noble Marquess had not chivalrously made the assertion, I should myself have felt some doubt as to whether he would have accepted the mission had he anticipated all the difficult circumstances which attended it. It is remarkable that as early as November 12 he should have received a telegraphic message rather calling him to account for informing the Government only of the views of the Russian Ambassador, and not also of those of the other Plenipotentiaries—a very sharp reminder indeed that he was not to forget that he was to accept no propositions whatever, except for the purpose of referring them home. That must have made a considerable impression upon the noble Marquess as to the difficulties of his mission. Then, again, all the Press which supported the policy of the Government used language which I must say seemed to have been inspired, and inspired by the speech which was delivered by the noble Earl at the head of the Government at the Guildhall. Now, some allusions were made in “another place” to that speech, and what was the answer which the Leader of the House there made? He said that a wrong construction had been put upon it; that he could not remember the exact words, but that after the observations that had been made he had no doubt the noble Earl would hasten to give a full explanation of the statement he then made. Well, the noble Earl did speak, after those observations were made, but not one word did he say on the subject. I presume he was perfectly satisfied with the explanation that had been given by the noble Earl the Foreign Secretary. And what was that explanation? Also that the speech had been misconstrued, and that neither he nor anybody else who had heard it was aware that any offence to Russia was given in that speech. Well, but do your Lordships remember what that speech contained? The noble Earl (the Earl of Beaconsfield) once gave a lesson to a Liberal Foreign Minister. He told him that sarcasm was an ornament of debate and an admitted weapon of rhetoric, but that conciliation was the proper language of diplomacy, and that the manner of carrying an intimation to a foreign Power was not by a sneer. What did the noble Earl say? He turned into extreme ridicule the policy of the Russian Government; he boasted of the unlimited military strength of this country; and he sneered at a want of endurance in the military strength of Russia. This was the language used at the first party of the Lord Mayor, after the loving cup had gone round; and I cannot understand the noble Earl the Foreign Secretary considering that such language could not possibly be thought offensive by Russia. Well, as I said, that speech—made by the Prime Minister—gave a tone to the supporters of the Government, and it is, moreover, to be borne in mind that this speech was made at a most critical part of the noble Marquess's mission at Constantinople. When the Turkish Government refused the proposals made to them, the whole Press resounded with the highest approbation of the pluck and courage of the Porte; and one newspaper, generally favoured with early information, stated, in an article, which was printed in a peculiar type, that the noble Marquess was an impetuous nobleman, and had far exceeded his Instructions. It is somewhat extraordinary that when such language was used by the Press, and was commented upon by the whole of Europe, not one of the Colleagues of the noble Marquess at home should have found or even made an opportunity of publicly stating to us and to the world that such language as that was quite contrary to the policy of Her Majesty's Government. More than that—I never heard, in the whole course of diplomacy, of a step taken which was so calculated to be fatal to a mission such as that undertaken by the noble Marquess as was that set out in the two despatches which have been quoted by my noble Friend the noble Duke. My noble Friend quoted a message which was put into the hands of the Foreign Secretary by the Turkish Minister, expressing the immense gratitude of the Turkish Government. [The Marquess of SALISBURY interposed an observation which was not heard.] Well, those despatches were docketed in the Foreign Office, and I find that a most important phrase was omitted from the docket. It describes the despatch as being one in which the Foreign Secretary conveys to the Turkish Ambassador that this country will not help Turkey, but not a word does it say of the most important sentence it contains. My noble Friend says that it was under pressure that the noble Earl wrote this passage—

“Being anxious to avoid the possibility of any misconception as to the line of policy followed by Her Majesty's Government, I addressed a private note to his Excellency reminding him that in an unofficial conversation which had taken place between us on the 19th ultimo I had informed him that although Her Majesty's Government did not themselves meditate or threaten the employment of active measures of coercion in the event of the proposals of the Powers being refused by the Porte, yet that Turkey must not look to England for assistance or protection if that refusal resulted in a war with other countries.” — [Turkey, No. 2. p. 182.]

The complaint we make is not that, having adopted that policy, they should not have said something contrary to it, but that they should be so excessively candid that, at a very critical period of the Mission of the noble Marquess, they should have allowed the Turkish Ambassador to convey to the Porte that it had absolutely nothing to fear from us. The noble Marquess chivalrously undertook the defence of this step; but I must say, I think that if, when he left this country, he understood that the ground was to be so entirely cut from under any remonstrances he might make or any pressure he might put upon the Turkish Government, his conduct at the Conference was not so sagacious as I had thought. If he had thought that, instead of joining the preliminary Conference—which the noble Earl told us was rather a mark of respect to the Turkish Government—a Conference held at Constantinople, and from which the Turkish Representative was excluded — instead of using the strong and frank language which he did on all occasions to the Sultan and his Ministers, I think his only chance of arriving at a satisfactory result would have been to take an exactly different line—to have stepped into the shoes of Sir Henry Elliot, and, as far as the honesty of his nature would have permitted, to have shown the greatest sympathy with the Turks, and avoided anything likely to excite their feelings. My Lords, I do not know whether you will allow me to illustrate this now. In both Houses of Parliament attacks were made on Her Majesty's late Government in reference to their Black Sea Treaty. One point was that the Emperor of Russia declared that he absolved himself from certain conditions of that Treaty—conditions which have been attacked in this Parliament, but for which it was thought, and rightly, that a very efficient substitute might be provided. Austria, France, Italy, and Germany had previously declared to the Emperor that the provision was one which ought not to exist. That was a very delicate matter to deal with, as it was said that the declaration of the Emperor had been couched in such a manner as to appear offensive to this nation and to the rest of Europe. Well, the noble Marquess knows very well that a great deal of important business is transacted outside the Council Chamber. I have no doubt that in audiences with the Sultan and Members of the Turkish Government, as well as in private communications with the Representatives of other Courts, matters as important were discussed as any which were considered at the Conference; and with respect to the Black Sea Conference, I had to meet one of the most acute and sagacious diplomatists I have known—Prince Gortchakoff. His object was quite clear from the first—it was to make me commit myself. He wished me to state what our course would be if the Russian Government did give the assurance we required, and on the other hand to state what would be our course if they refused. My answer was the same thing every day—that I would not say one word, or give any hint of the future until I heard a retraction of that declaration. But now, if in the middle of that conversation I had told Baron Brunnow—"You may communicate it confidentially to your Government by telegraph, that whatever your answer may be, we will not quarrel with you," do you think that that retraction would have been given in the same ample and satisfactory manner? And do you think that if, instead of the noble Marquess, an angel from Heaven, with ten times, and more than ten times, his ability, sagacity, and his earnestness, had come down, it would have been possible to persuade the Turk to agree to anything if he had been told there is not the slightest fear of any consequences? The noble Marquess says that the real thing that changed the Turk was a false report, spread about intentionally, that the Russian Army was attacked by sickness.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY was understood to say that the report was not intentionally inaccurate.

EARL GRANVILLE: That report, it was said, influenced the Turks, and I verily believe it. As soon as the Turk heard that he had nothing to fear from the person who was really in earnest, and that he had nothing to fear from us, he naturally resisted any further concessions. I do not know anything more creditable to the private history of a man than that the noble Marquess should have come back from the Conference and have received the increased, instead of the diminished, respect and esteem of his countrymen. The answer I obtained, on the opening of Parliament, to a nearly similar Question to that put by the noble Duke, was that when a person advises a friend and he rejects his advice, his friend's only course is to wash his hands of the matter and let it drop. That answer was, I think, somewhat modified by the subsequent speeches in this House, and the Leader of the Government in the other House said that the policy of the Government had resulted in the sincere agreement of all the Powers of Europe and a determination towards concerted action. If the Government policy was really that of washing their hands of the whole thing and seeing what would happen, it is impossible to doubt that one of two alternatives would happen—either that Russia would advance alone and engage in hostilities such as were described by Mr. Canning 50 years ago, as hostilities of which no prudence could prescribe the range, and of which no man could foresee the possible consequences; or that, on the other hand, a peace would be made exactly of that character described by the Leader of the Government in "another place" as no peace at all, but mere patchwork—a piece of sticking-plaster placed on a festering sore. In such a case what would you have to rely upon? Her Majesty's Government have said—and it is the only declaration they have made—that they will not join in coercion against Turkey. I will not enter unnecessarily upon the question of coercion, but really the noble Marquess held language with respect to coercion from which it is to be inferred that first of all he believed coercion must ensue, and next that coercion would be resisted. I totally disbelieve it. What is there in the history of Turkey to lead us to suppose that a State which has never resisted any single Power whatever unless supported either directly or indirectly by some other Power, would dream of resisting the whole of Europe combined when really in earnest and coming forward with moderate proposals? When the noble Marquess talks of the only means of coercing the Turks being the bombardment of Constantinople, I think that is a perfect chimera. Why, no less a person than the Duke of Wellington was ready to consent to a joint military occupation of the five Great Powers, rightly rejecting Mr. Canning's proposal that England and Russia alone should do it. What is more—a military occupation has occurred in our own time, and was quite successful. And therefore to put the almost impossible contingency of our being obliged to exercise coercion, and when it came to the point being without means to carry it into effect, is surely trespassing a little on the credulity of your Lordships. After the statement of the noble Earl this evening, and still more after the statements of the noble Marquess, it is clear that the Government have not adopted a "washing-our-hands" policy. I sincerely rejoice at it. The noble Earl seemed to attach some value to the promises of Midhat Pasha. He was a very remarkable reformer, but the noble Marquess tells us this evening he was the great obstacle to the reception of our proposals. I say that as to believing the promises of Midhat Pasha, or Edhem Pasha, or any other Pasha, I would refer your Lordships not only to the history of the Ignatieff Note, but also to the despatches of the noble Marquess passim as to the utter futility of such promises. As to the new Turkish Constitution, the noble Marquess has given us a very graphic description, from which I cannot help reading one or two sentences. The noble Marquess, writing to the Foreign Secretary, said—

"The law of the Budget stands upon a special footing. It must be introduced at the beginning of every Session, and is voted, chapter by chapter, by the Chamber of Deputies. In this case the power of amendment is conceded to the Chamber; but, as no decision can be taken without the assent of the Ministers, this power has little practical value. If the Government desires to spend any money or to raise any revenue without the authority of the Assembly, and in its absence, they can do so, but a law justifying the proceeding must be presented in the ensuing Session. The Constitution does not say what consequences would follow in case the law of justification should not pass. Subject to the same undefined responsibility, the Government may, in the absence of the Assembly, issue a decree on any matter which they think it necessary to deal with, and (if it be not contrary to the Constitution) the decree has the force of law. The Chamber of Deputies may also pass a resolution to ask a question of a Minister; but this privilege, like others, is restrained from excess by a reservation. The Minister may postpone his answer if he thinks fit. The Ministers are declared to be responsible. Their responsibility consists in the provision that they may, if the Sultan thinks fit, but not otherwise, be tried by a procedure not yet determined on. Any doubt arising as to the meaning of any part of the Constitution is solved by the Senate, which is nominated by the Sultan. It is obvious that even if this Constitution were in operation among a people attached to liberty, and were practically worked by independent Representatives, it would have but a slender effect in checking maladministration and restraining the abuse of power. But there is no probability of the appearance of popular leaders who would work the liberties granted, such as they are, for the purpose of restraining the Government, for an unlimited power of exile is by a special enactment reserved to the Sultan, and any person exiled loses his seat as Senator or Deputy."

I presume that Midhat Pasha is at the present moment neither a Deputy nor a Senator. I do not, however, wish to press this. The noble Marquess goes on to say—

"The portion of the Constitution which concerns the Chamber is elaborated with considerable care. The rest of its provisions only exist in skeleton. Many broad principles are laid down, but their execution is referred to laws which are not yet in existence or to 'règlements' which are to be issued by the Sultan. The appointment, qualifications, and jurisdiction of all functionaries, the constitution of Tribunals and the administration of the provinces, are dealt with in this manner. It is, of course, impossible to forecast the character of the legislation which will be adopted upon these important matters. The dismissal of functionaries at their discretion is especially reserved to the Government. These observations will enable your Lordship to judge how far the Constitution can be looked upon as a Guarantee against maladministration or a restraint upon the excesses of arbitrary power."—[Turkey, No. 2, p. 303.]

If Her Majesty's Government really see their way to maintain peace, and if they really do maintain peace, it will be chiefly by the argument that Russia is going to war. If by any means a better administration of the Turkish Provinces can be secured, I am sure the Government would have the complete support of Parliament. The noble Lord was good enough to admit the other night that I had spoken temperately and with moderation. I should deeply regret on this occasion—although I have freely expressed my views on some subjects raised in debate as to the past conduct of the Government, and it would be quite unintentional on my part—if I have used any language which could in the slightest degree embarrass the Government, or make it more difficult to arrive at that result which with some confidence they have promised us this evening.

THE EARL OF BEACONSFIELD: My Lords, the noble Duke (the Duke of Argyll) has summoned us to listen to some Questions which he was going to address to us with respect to the conduct of the recent negotiations at Constantinople; but such is the clearness of his philosophic mind, and such the candour of his ingenuous disposition, that when he had concluded his able and interesting speech, he found, as a statesman, that he was not justified in addressing to us the Questions that he had announced, and I believe the noble Duke did not put one of the Questions of which he had given Notice.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL: May I beg the noble Earl's pardon? I said the Question I put was different from that of which I had given Notice, having changed it on account of the misconception that had been put upon it in the Press; but I did put the Question.

THE EARL OF BEACONSFIELD: I am the last person to question the rights and privileges of an Opposition. Their duties and their privileges are both high. Practically speaking, they are now a part of the Constitution of this country. It is their duty to watch and criticise the conduct of the Ministry; and no doubt indirectly they exercise no slight influence on the Government. But I think, my Lords, that if the policy of the Government is impugned—and directly impugned—it is better some Motion should be brought forward by which we can enter completely upon the subject rather than have these, it may be, interesting but somewhat desultory debates which have occurred here to-night, and lately in other places. I understand—especially from the speech to which we have just listened—that the conduct of the Government is impugned, and the noble Earl (Earl Granville) is not the first who to-night has given expression to the same opinion. The noble Earl and his friends are of opinion that we should have coerced the Porte into accepting the policy which we recommended. That is not a course which we can conscientiously profess or promote; and I think, therefore, when an issue so broad is brought before the House it really is the duty of noble Lords to give us an opportunity to clear the mind of the country by letting it know what is the opinion of Parliament upon policies so distinct and which in their consequences must be so different. Let us for a moment take a broad view of what has been the situation and the conduct of the Government. We have been called upon somewhat unexpectedly to deal with the largest and the most difficult problem of modern politics. We have been called upon, as many eminent statesmen have been called upon before, to consider this—whether the Ottoman Empire could maintain itself; or whether, after long and sanguinary wars, its vast possessions might be doomed to partition, which probably might affect, without any exaggeration, even the fate of Empires. My Lords, the policy of Europe on this Question has been distinct, and is almost traditional. I say, absolutely, the policy of Europe, and not merely the policy of England, as it is sometimes described, has been this—that by the maintenance of the territorial integrity and independence of the Ottoman Empire great calamities may be averted from Europe, wars may be prevented, and wars of no ordinary duration, and such a disturbance of the distribution of the power as might operate most disadvantageously to the general welfare. The phrase "the territorial integrity and independence of the Ottoman Empire" has been frequently referred to to-night, and in language of derision. The noble Duke in his opening speech alluded to it, and questioned—scarcely supposing there could be a doubt about—the propriety of the phrase. Another noble Lord followed his example. But your Lordships will remember it embodies a principle which always has been accepted by statesmen; and the proof of it is seen that in this very Conference whose proceedings we are called upon to consider to-night, the basis on which my noble Friend achieved the great feat which has been admired by the noble Duke and his friends of bringing all the Powers to consent to this Conference was their recognition of the territorial integrity and independence of the Ottoman Empire. Therefore this is not a mere phrase of newspapers; but it is one used by statesmen in authority, and it has recently been used by statesmen in authority in these very momentous transactions which are now the subject of our discussion. I think there is some misconception as to the meaning of these words. By recognizing the integrity of a country you recognize the integrity of its possessions at the time that recognition takes place. It is often said, how absurd it is to maintain the territorial integrity of Turkey when Turkey has lost so many Provinces and so many kingdoms. What country is there that has not been equally unfortunate in this respect? England has lost Provinces—most precious Provinces—and was there any time, even at the signature of the Act of Independence, when any English statesman would have hesitated to come forward and maintain the integrity of the British Empire? Our gifted neighbours have recently lost two most valuable Provinces; but I believe there is no man in France who is not prepared to die for the integrity of the French Dominion. If I wished to carry the illustration further, I might point to Austria, who too has lost Provinces; but it would be astonishing if any one pretended it had no right to maintain the territorial integrity of its Empire. So, I hold, we should view the territorial integrity of the Ottoman Empire as a political and material fact. It may have lost Servia, Greece, the Danubian Principalities, and more than one kingdom in Asia; still it has the right to maintain its territorial integrity, and its territorial integrity as existing at this moment is a political and material fact. I come now to the question of the independence of Turkey. That is an expression considered to be entirely indefensible. There is a great misapprehension in that view. When we recognize the "independence of a country," it is that we contemplate in that country a durable sovereignty; and such a durable sovereignty is not impaired by any partial or limited interference with its sovereign rights. For example, the independence of Turkey was not affected by the occupation of Syria; and I maintain further, that the independence of Turkey would not have been affected if the policy recommended by my noble Friend at the Conference had been adopted. Take an illustrative case—a case not of remote times, but of this century and in the remembrance of our fathers. Take the case of Prussia. Prussia is one of the most powerful States in the world, certainly the most powerful State of the German Empire. Only at the beginning of this century Prussia was subjected to more humiliating conditions than ever were imposed on Turkey. Her strong places were occupied by foreign garrisons; her Sovereign was prevented exercising the precious privilege of enlisting his own subjects in his own defence—at least, in this respect his powers were so limited that they amounted to no importance; and yet the independence of Prussia was not lost by these passing circumstances. Therefore, I do protest that, in discussing these vast questions which involve probably, as events proceed, principles and consequences which may have a great influence upon the condition of this country and the destinies of its people, we do not too loosely adopt opinions which clearly have no solidity and substance in them. All the statesmen who have had to deal with these affairs have accepted and maintained and enforced the principle that we should uphold the territorial integrity and independence of Turkey as the best security for the peace of Europe. I will not advert to ancient Treaties. I will notice only those which noble Lords have mentioned in their speeches—those with which your Lordships are familiar. These are the Treaties of the Pacification of the Levant, the Treaty for the Regulation of the

Navigation of the Straits, the celebrated Treaty of Paris, to which we have so frequently adverted, the Tripartite Treaty, and the Treaty authorizing the re-entry of France into the European concert; all these Treaties acknowledge and completely recognize the principle of the territorial integrity of Turkey in respect of her actual possessions. Depart from that principle, and we leave the ship without a rudder in our discussions. What may happen in the future I pretend not to foresee, but at present Turkey is by Treaty a member of the European concert, and we must deal with her by the full recognition of her rights and our own. Well, what has happened since the celebrated Treaty of Paris that should make us doubt that this principle, which has been adopted by the most eminent statesmen of all Parties, is not a wise and just one? In 1862 you had in hand affairs of considerable difficulty with regard to Turkey, as you have at the present moment. There was a state of things very similar to the present. There was an insurrection in Herzegovina. It was stimulated, encouraged, and supported by a Prince of Montenegro; and the Chancellor of Russia, no less than the distinguished statesman who now controls the affairs of that Government, addressed the same complaints as we have recently received as to the conduct of the Turkish Government to its Christian subjects. There was much diplomatic correspondence on the subject. The noble Earl (Earl Granville) and his friends opposite were then in power. There is a despatch of Lord John Russell addressed to a gentleman whose name has been mentioned in this debate—Sir Henry Bulwer—in which Lord John Russell—he is a Member of this House, and I ought to call him by his proper title, but I had the honour and happiness of sitting with him for many years in the House of Commons, and I am apt to call him by the name he then bore—that eminent man expressed in a despatch which lies on the Table that, in the opinion of his Government, the revolt in Herzegovina was a conspiracy. He expressed himself on that head in uncompromising terms; and shortly after addressed to a noble Lord now sitting in this House, then our Ambassador at St. Petersburg (Lord Napier), a circular, in which those views were expressed at great length and with much fulness, and he declared that the policy of the Government was unchanged, and that was to maintain the territorial integrity and independence of Turkey as provided and secured by existing Treaties. There was some discussion in the House of Commons on the subject. It is curious that from a casual indisposition, which rarely occurred to him, Lord Palmerston was absent. He could not be present at the discussion, for which his great talents, knowledge, and authority were so adapted; but he was represented by one of the ablest men of the day—no less a one than the eminent Gentleman who was my predecessor in the post I hold (Mr. Gladstone). It fell to that right hon. Gentleman to speak on the subject, and he vindicated in 1862 fully and completely the views of Lord Palmerston, and he maintained those particular views which were founded on the real tradition of the territorial integrity and independence of Turkey. Therefore, so late as in 1862 we find that it was completely recognized by the noble Earl; and I apprehend that the noble Duke, who was a Member of that Government, must have given his no doubt cordial concurrence to that despatch of the noble Earl then Secretary of State. Then, in 1871, a memorable event occurred. The noble Earl who has just addressed us (Earl Granville) has spoken fully on the subject. Russia determined to violate the Treaty of 1856. The noble Earl questioned that right, and, I have no doubt, really doubted the policy of such a proceeding. A Conference was held in consequence, and the result of that Conference is known to every noble Lord now present. I have been astonished to hear of late the excuses that have been made for the conduct of that Conference, so far as the laches it committed in not considering the condition of the Christian subjects of the Porte. It was said recently that, from the peculiar accidents of the time, the Conference was a hurried business with a limited purpose, summoned to calk a leak, and no more.

EARL GRANVILLE: Was that said by any Peer?

THE EARL OF BEACONSFIELD: No; but by one of great authority—by my predecessor in office; and as a Member of the Government of that right hon. Gentleman I am sure the noble Earl will be ready to acknowledge his great authority. And yet I am sure the noble Earl would never sanction a statement that he managed his affairs in such a hurried, haphazard manner. Germany and France were at that time at war; but Russia and England were at peace and had time enough to attend to their proper business in a regular manner, and I have every confidence in the noble Earl to believe that he must have omitted no opportunity of doing his duty to his Sovereign, to his country, and to his own feelings, and did not lose the occasion given him by the revision of the Treaty of Paris in 1871. What I want to show is this—that the Conference of 1871 was not a haphazard transaction, but one conducted with due deliberation and caution by the noble Earl, as became his high character, experience, and position, and that everything must have been done on that occasion which was considered necessary for the interests of this country, and, I will say, of humanity in general. Look to the date of this hurried affair, as it is called. Prince Gortchakoff's letter which made this extraordinary announcement of an intended defeasance of the Treaty of Paris was dated October 31, and was communicated by Baron Brunnow to the noble Earl opposite on November 9, 1870, Lord Mayor's Day—an important day it would seem in Turkish politics. Now I trust that letter was delivered to the noble Earl after dinner, for it was a disagreeable one to have received before. That was November 9. The Conference did not meet until January 17; so that there was plenty of time for the more important business of the Conference, which we have been reminded just now by the noble Earl, takes place before its formal meetings. Two months elapsed before the Conference met, and two from the date of the Conference until it terminated—or four months since the letter was received—and there were several formal sittings. Now, can it be believed, if the condition of the Christian subjects of the Porte in 1871 was such or anything like such as has been now described, that the noble Earl and his Colleagues would have hesitated to probe the wound to the very bottom and to have seized that opportunity to obtain the necessary redress? That is the point. But then I am told that this was a hurried affair and necessarily not attended to with the requirements which so great a political question demand. I must say I am under a different impression. The noble Earl will correct me at some time or other if I err; but I was always under the impression that at the Conference of London the whole fasciculus of Treaties was well considered by the noble Earl and his Colleagues. That the Treaty on the Straits was considered is a fact, because it was modified. I always heard that the Tripartite Treaty was taken into consideration, and it was considered whether the engagement should not be extended to other Powers. I do not see well how four months could have been employed about the Conference unless its acknowledged labours were such as I have intimated. Therefore I say that I have a right to believe that in 1871, when this important Treaty of Paris was revised and all the other Treaties connected with our relations with the Ottoman Porte were considered, the opinion of British statesmen had not changed, and that they were then still of opinion, and they expressed it in those revised Treaties, that the maintenance of the territorial integrity and independence of the Ottoman Empire was of vital importance to the interests of Europe. Well, so great an event as the revision of the Treaty of Paris could not pass without notice in “another place,” and in consequence of some comments that were made, a noble Lord now a Member of this House (Viscount Enfield), who was then the able representative of the Foreign Department in the House of Commons, vindicated the conduct of his Government and that of the Turkish Government. He said—

“The position of Turkey since the Crimean War had been ameliorated. Turkey had been able to equip, man, and hold a Navy which was in a creditable state of efficiency, and her Army was in such a condition as would enable her to hold her own against hostile visitors. The internal condition of Turkey had also improved since the Crimean War. The Danubian Provinces had secured autonomy, and the Christian population and subjects of the Porte were no longer as hostile to her rule as formerly.”—[3 Hansard, ccv. 966.]

There was some controversy, and the Minister of the day rose and supported the noble Lord who represented the Foreign Office, and said that he perfectly accepted his view of the whole situation. That Minister was my predecessor. Therefore, as late as the end of the Session of 1871—in July, I believe—we find that what I may call the traditional policy of England was not changed—that to uphold the territorial integrity and independence of the Ottoman Empire was not considered an idle and obsolete policy. That was only five years ago, and, therefore, the views which now seem adopted respecting the condition of the Christian population of Turkey must have at least the charm of novelty for the noble Earl, because with his unrivalled opportunities and advantages for obtaining information the most accurate and authentic, the noble Earl did not consider it necessary for the Government of which he was a Member to take any action; and, indeed, in the other House of Parliament the conduct of the Turkish Government as to the condition of its Christian subjects was not only acknowledged, but eulogized. Well, then, I ask, what has happened since then to induce this change? That has happened since which curiously enough happened in 1862. There has been another revolt in Herzegovina, another stimulative action from the Principality of Montenegro, and fresh complaints from the Government of St. Petersburg of the conduct of the Porte towards its Christian subjects. Well, my Lords, I am here to vindicate the conduct of Her Majesty's Government upon that head. It is unnecessary to discuss the question as to our right of interference in the internal affairs of Turkey. That interference on our part was requested by the Porte. Appealed to, I maintain the conduct of the Government was a prudent and circumspect policy, and showed due sympathy with the distressing circumstances which were then brought before them. Those who would charge the Government with neglect of their duty in this respect utterly fail in their first step. They cannot deny that when we were appealed to to sanction the deputation of the Consuls to the insurrectionary chiefs with a view of terminating a sanguinary revolt we acceded—with, again, I am bound to say, the entire sanction of the Porte. Then it is said—"You did nothing. It is very true that you agreed to the Andrassy Note, but that Note really effected nothing, and there you stopped." It is very true that the Andrassy Note failed. I think it is not difficult to indicate the causes of the failure. I shall touch upon these points with the utmost brevity, because your Lordships are so familiar with them; but it is necessary on occasions like the present, when the Government has to meet charges, that our defence should be before the countries. Now the Andrassy Note was looked upon by Her Majesty's Government, I frankly own, as an injudicious move—it was essentially, in their opinion, an inopportune move. To attempt in a country like Turkey to carry out a social reform in provinces in a state of savage insurrection appeared to us to be perfectly idle. But we had to consider, in the first place, the request of the Porte that we would not withdraw ourselves from the European concert; and, in the second place, we had to consider that, on analyzing that document, we found that it only proposed—and wisely and skilfully proposed—that those engagements should be maintained which the Porte had entered into by its firmans and decrees. In addition to this we thought it no disadvantage that in the then unsatisfactory state of affairs in that part of the world there should be again a public recognition by the Porte of its duties and of its engagements, as well as a renovated agreement to fulfil them. Therefore, under those circumstances, we gave in our adhesion to the Andrassy Note. That Note met with that fate which was the inevitable consequence of the unhappy circumstances with which it had to contend. Well, then, your Lordships know, that time elapsed—another year nearly elapsed—and then came the Berlin Memorandum. Our conduct in reference to that Memorandum has been questioned often—and it has been questioned to-night—I myself do not think with justice or with accuracy. Before I touch upon the course which we took with respect to the Berlin Memorandum let me advert to some remarks which were made by the noble Earl (the Earl of Dudley) who preceded the noble Lord who last addressed us. The noble Earl appears to have addressed us to-night with the hope of bringing about an Autumn Session—although I must say that in the month of February that seems a task even beyond the noble Earl's resources. The noble Earl says that he has no objection to the general policy of the Government. He approves the general policy of the Government, but he cannot support the Government in consequence of their conduct with regard to what are called the Bulgarian atrocities. He says that we did not impart sufficient information to Parliament, and that the discontent of the country has entirely originated from that studied negligence on the part of the Ministry. ["Hear!"] The noble Earl (the Earl of Dudley) cheers that remark, and I accept that cheer as his acknowledgment that I have accurately described his views. Now I wish to give to the House the most striking illustration of the complete ignorance that pervaded, not England alone but the whole world, the whole of Europe, and especially those countries nearest to the spot where those atrocities were committed, and whose border populations were, above all others, most deeply interested in the matter. I wish, I say, to give your Lordships a striking instance of the ignorance which prevailed at that time. When the three Imperial Powers met to compose the Berlin Memorandum they composed it with an aggravation of all their charges against the Porte. It is the custom of diplomacy—and I do not object to it—that there should be an insertion of every circumstance ad invidiam that had occurred since the publication and failure of the Andrassy Note; and yet, although Germany, Austria, and Russia were the Powers that concocted that celebrated State paper, not a single allusion is made in it to the Bulgarian atrocities, notwithstanding that they had been perpetrated a fortnight before that Memorandum was framed. So far as Her Majesty's Government were concerned nothing could be more painful and nothing more injurious to our position when we were called upon for information upon such a subject than for us to be unable to satisfy the wish of Parliament and of the country. But the truth is this—We have heard in the course of these debates something about Consular Agents and the information that could be obtained by their means: but the truth is, that these atrocities were perpetrated in parts of Turkey which are unwisely denuded of Consular supervision, there being no commercial demands for such agencies, and the Government of a past day having considerably reduced the Consular agencies in the Turkish Empire.

on the point. I think he will find that there were Consulates in some of the districts of Bulgaria. I do not desire to enter generally into the Consular question, but will he state what Consulates were abolished?

THE EARL OF BEACONSFIELD: I will take care that the noble Earl shall have the information he desires; but I am under the impression that several Consulates in European Turkey had been abolished. They were, I believe, abolished in consequence of a Report of a Committee of the House of Commons, and therefore I make no charge in this respect against any Government of which the noble Lord was a Member, if indeed it was that Government which reduced them. I will now revert to the Berlin Memorandum. Well, we objected to the Berlin Memorandum upon this broad ground. There were, of course, many other grounds of objection to that document which have been stated by my noble Friend in his despatches which are upon the Table of the House; but we objected to it upon this broad ground—that to our minds it would obviously and inevitably lead to the military occupation of European Turkey. That is a policy which we have always resisted, and it is a policy which we have as yet successfully resisted. It is a policy which the noble Earl may see, by reading the Papers upon the Table, has cropped up more than once in the course of these negotiations, since the Berlin Memorandum was drawn up, and we have always resisted it, and hitherto successfully resisted it. I am perfectly ready to found the vindication of our conduct with regard to the Berlin Memorandum upon that broad ground. I think that there are many other grounds which would have rendered it impossible for us in the then state of the Porte to have given in our adhesion to it, but that one is ample justification for our refusal to join in it, and I believe the country approved the conduct of the Government in so refusing. It has been frequently charged against us in the past, and has been charged against us to-night, that having refused the Berlin Memorandum we took no steps and made no proposition of our own. Well, that is not a just observation. Ten days elapsed after the Berlin Memorandum was refused, and then a revolution happened in Constantinople; and the first public act after that revolution was, I believe, an amnesty published and announced to all the subjects of the Porte. Well, that was thought an opportunity by which a termination might be put to those revolts, and the opportunity was not lost. It is very true that it was limited to what my noble Friend the Secretary of State properly called "communications," but they were communications of the greatest moment, and it was from those communications that ultimately we succeeded in having adopted by all the other Powers the propositions which we submitted to the Conference. Now, there were two great policies before us with regard to the Christian subjects of the Porte. There was the Russian plan, and it was one deserving of all respect. It was a plan for establishing a chain of autonomous States, tributary to the Porte but in every other sense independent. No one can deny that was a large scheme, worthy of statesmen and worthy of the deepest consideration. But the result of the deepest consideration that Her Majesty's Government could give to it was that they were forced entirely to disapprove of that scheme. This scheme of a chain of autonomous States in the Balkan country, and, indeed, in the whole of the country that during the last half century has been known as European Turkey, is a state of affairs that has existed before. The Turks did not step from Asia and conquer Constantinople—as is sometimes mentioned in speeches at National Conferences. It was very gradually that they entered and established in Europe. As a rising military Power they obtained territories near the Black Sea, and ultimately entered into Thracia, and there they remained for some time in company with all these independent and autonomous States. There was, of course, an Emperor of Constantinople, there was a King of Bulgaria, there was a King of Servia, there was a Hospodar of Wallachia, there was a Duke of Athens, and there was a Prince of Corinth. And what happened? The new military Power that had entered Europe gradually absorbed and conquered all these independent States, and, having conquered these independent and autonomous States, these kingdoms and duchies—the Empire of Constantinople being now limited to its matchless city and to what in modern diplomatic language is called "a cabbage garden," was invested and fell. And it did occur to us that if there were a chain of autonomous States and the possessors of Constantinople were again limited to "a cabbage garden," probably the same result might occur. Well, I do not pretend to say who first introduced this word autonomy into these negotiations. If we did we must bear the blame. But against this plan of the Russian Court we proposed what was called by some one—the phrase was adopted at least—administrative autonomy, and we defined that administrative autonomy to be institutions that would secure to the Christian subjects of the Porte some control over their local affairs, and some security against the excesses of arbitrary power. And what happened, my Lords? Discussions did occur between Her Majesty's Government and the Government of St. Petersburg; and the result of those discussions was, that the Russian Government gave up their views and adopted those of England; and I had a right to say—as I said in a speech in my own county, to which I would not have alluded if the noble Earl had not done so—there was no Government that met us more cordially on this subject, or assisted us more readily than the Government of St. Petersburg. Well, there were circumstances that prevented at that moment a conclusion being reached, the greatest being the breaking out of the Servian War. But when an opportunity occurred my noble Friend the Secretary of State reverted to those views which he knew would be acceptable, and the fact that they were accepted at last by all the six Powers proves that the expectation on our part of their success was not an ill-judged one. Now, my Lords, not to weary your Lordships with unnecessary detail, I come to this Conference which we are told has failed, but which I hope may yet bear fruit. The noble Earl has made several remarks which I can hardly pass unnoticed, as they refer to myself personally. The noble Earl seems to have a doubt whether my noble Friend (the Marquess of Salisbury) had the confidence of his Colleagues, and he gave his reasons for that doubt. I had the honour, from the position which I occupy, to select my noble Friend for the duty which he so patriotically accepted. I selected him not merely on account of his talents, on which in his presence I will not for a moment dwell—and it is unnecessary, because they are fully and generously recognized by your Lordships on both sides—but I did select my noble Friend because he happened to be at the head of that Department over which the noble Duke who introduced this subject (the Duke of Argyll) himself once ably presided. I selected my noble Friend because he presided over a Department where the considerations of State connected with it, where the great knowledge which he must have thus acquired, could not but be of signal service to him in the discharge of the duties which awaited him at Constantinople. I selected my noble Friend, also, because I knew that upon all the large and leading subjects which have occupied the attention of the House this evening there was between him and myself a cordial and complete concurrence. On all the grounds which I have indicated I thought my noble Friend would be found well suited for the post. But he is supposed not to have had the confidence of his Colleagues because he seems to have been attacked in some newspapers generally supporting the Administration, and because his Colleagues have not written leading articles in his defence. Every public man is liable to such attacks. No one has been more attacked in the newspapers than myself. I dare say I have had as many leading articles, mainly of a vituperative nature, written against me as anyone ever had. And yet I declare upon my honour that I do not know a single Colleague who ever wrote a single line in my defence. Yet they all possess my confidence; and I believe they have some trust in me. I therefore think that the principal argument of the noble Earl opposite—

EARL GRANVILLE: Not the principal argument. Those were words which I did not use.

THE EARL OF BEACONSFIELD: Then there must have been a ventriloquist in the House; because on this side of the House we were all under the impression that that was the principal argument of the noble Earl. Then the noble Earl says the statements in my Guildhall speech were never vindicated when he alluded to them the other day, and that I seemed to be satisfied by the defensive observations of my noble Friend the Foreign Secretary. Well, I certainly was satisfied with his observations; for my noble Friend only made one observation on the subject, and I thought that one was perhaps one too much. Why, what did I say at the Guildhall? What are the statements? We hear a great deal of the "statements," and the noble Earl looked as if they were something terrible, statements that could not be mentioned to ears polite. Why does he not say what the statements were? I will tell him what they were. I said that the policy of England was a policy of peace; that there was no country of which peace was more essentially the policy than of England, because we wanted nothing. We coveted no city and no province; but I also stated that if we had good reasons for going to war, reasons which touched our liberties, our honour, or our Empire—if there was to be such a war, and we were unfortunately brought into it—we should enter into that war with a determination to carry it on until right were done. These were the statements that I made in the Guildhall. These are the statements that I now make in the House of Lords. I entirely adhere to them. They were no sneer. I was unconscious of any sarcasm. They were the sincere expression of my own feelings and I believe also of those of my Colleagues. Then the noble Earl contrasts his own behaviour at the Conference of London on the violation of the Black Sea Treaty and the conduct of my noble Friend at the Conference at Constantinople. The noble Earl asks—"If I had acted at the Conference of 1871 as the noble Marquess acted or was obliged to act, from a want of confidence or from the timidity on the part of my Colleagues, do you ever think I should have succeeded in the difficult enterprize in which I had embarked?" Now, I must say there is some courage in thus appealing to the violation of the Black Sea Treaty and the submission to it by the English Government as a proof of the noble Lord's valour and determination. I have expressed in "another place" my opinion of the conduct of the Government and of the noble Lord on that score. I do not wish to repeat it on this occasion; but as the noble Lord himself has forced me to notice that subject, I must tell him, further, that the duties which he had to fulfil at the Conference of London and those which had to be fulfilled by my noble Friend at the Conference of Constantinople were essentially different duties. Certainly, the noble Lord would not have succeeded in his efforts, if he had commenced his business at the London Conference by saying that nothing would induce England to have recourse to any violence if she could not obtain adhesion to the proposition she made. Why, the noble Lord went there to vindicate the honour and the interests of his country; and if the Russian Ambassador had refused the compensation which he demanded it would have been the noble Lord's duty to coerce the Power which had first outraged England, and then refused to do the only act which the noble Lord could devise in order to remove that stain on her reputation. But was that the position of my noble Friend at Constantinople? Why he was there as a mediator—he did not go there to threaten: and to suppose that we could go into such a Conference and not let it be known—as I believe it was generally known—that under no circumstances England would have recourse to coercion in order to carry her mediatorial recommendations into effect—I say to have entered the Conference at Constantinople and to have concealed that determination would have been acting with great duplicity. My Lords, I cannot believe that you will sanction for a moment the view which the noble Earl has taken on this subject, but that you will see at once that the situations of the two negotiators were essentially different—that if the noble Lord opposite had failed in his demand it would have been his duty immediately to consider whether and what coercion should be applied; whereas my noble Friend had a more difficult and more humble task—he was there as a mediator, he went not to coerce but to persuade. And allow me to say, when we are told that the Conference was a failure, that certainly there was no failure of my noble Friend in the principal object of his visit to Constantinople. When he went there what was the situation? Then, the first sine quâ non was that Bulgaria should be occupied by a Russian army. We had a great many other demands of a similar kind. Who succeeded in obtaining the withdrawal of those unreasonable proposals? Why, my noble Friend. My noble Friend fell only into one error, which I should have fallen into myself, and I believe every Member of this House would have done the same. He gave too much credit to the Turks for common sense, and he could not believe that when he made so admirable an arrangement in their favour, they would have lost so happy an opportunity.

My Lords, I have rather trespassed on your attention. I felt that to-night, although I regretted there was no direct issue brought before us, it was my duty in common with my Colleagues to vindicate the conduct of the Government. I hope I have shown that with respect to our general conduct we have pursued and upheld the traditionary policy of England, and because we believe it to be the best security for general peace. I hope I have shown that with regard to the secondary though important object, the condition of the Christian subjects of the Porte, our course has been circumspect and consistent, proved, as I think, by its having obtained the general approbation of the Powers. I will not touch upon the Imperial issues involved in this subject. It has been said that the people of this country are deeply interested in the humanitarian and philanthropic considerations involved in it. All must appreciate such feelings. But I am mistaken if there be not a yet deeper sentiment on the part of the people of this country, one with which I cannot doubt your Lordships will ever sympathise, and that is—the determination to maintain the Empire of England.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL, in referring to the telegram expressing the warm thanks of the Turkish Minister to the noble Earl the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, said that the telegram ought not to have been printed in the Blue Book, unless the noble Earl was prepared to state what was the nature of the communication for which such warm thanks were given. With regard to the Guildhall speech, there could be no doubt that in the terms in which the noble Earl (the Earl of Beaconsfield) used in reference to the ultimatum of the Emperor of Russia, that he was speaking at Russia, and in the Blue Book there appeared a communication from Prince Gortchakoff making serious comments on that speech.

THE EARL OF DERBY was understood to say that if there was no objection to it on public grounds, the information which the noble Duke desired would be given.

Moved, That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty for, Copy of the communication from the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs to the Turkish Minister, referred to in the telegram of the 24th of December, 1876.—(The Duke of Argyll.)

Motion (by leave of the House) withdrawn.

PUBLIC RECORD OFFICE BILL [H.L.]

A Bill to amend the Public Record Office Act, 1838—Was presented by The LORD CHANCELLOR; read 1st. (No. 8.)

House adjourned at Twelve o'clock, past Ten o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

NAVY—H.M.S. "VANGUARD."

QUESTION.

MR. SULLIVAN asked the First Lord of the Admiralty, If his attention has been drawn to the recent occurrence of a shipwreck attended with loss of life at Bray near Dublin, owing to the Captain of the vessel mistaking for the Kish Light the light marking Her Majesty's Ship "Vanguard;" and whether he can hold out hopes of speedy measures being taken to remove the cause and prevent the recurrence of such a lamentable casualty?

MR. HUNT: Sir, the facts which I have ascertained in reference to the affair are these—In last September a Nova Scotia vessel was making her way to Kingstown when the master mistook the light on the Vanguard for the Kish light. When he discovered his mistake he signalled for assistance, and the lifeboat came out and took off the crew, but on the way to land it capsized and three men were drowned. The master or owner was at fault in the wreck not being marked on his chart. The light over the wreck is a green revolving light and the Kish light is a white revolving light, therefore there could be no mistake as to their identity. Twelve months' notice was given to mariners of the light over the Vanguard. The light is not under the jurisdiction of the Admiralty, though they pay for it. It is under the jurisdiction of the Irish Lights Commissioners. It is not certain what will be done with reference to the Vanguard, as the Admiralty are negotiating a contract for raising her; but supposing that contract is completed, the light must remain so long as the works connected with the raising are being carried on.

COAL MINES—EXPLOSION IN DARCY LEVER COLLIERY.—QUESTION.

MR. MACDONALD asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, If it be correct that at sundry times shortly before the explosion of the mine belonging to Knowles and Son, Limited, at Darcy Lever by Bolton, some of the coal hewers had to return home from the presence of gas in the mine; and, whether, considering the peculiar circumstances of the management in the inspection of the mine, that he will order that the inquest be watched by some other person than the inspector, in the public interest?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS, in reply, said, that he could only learn from the agent and manager of the Darcy Lever mine that they knew of no gas having accumulated for several months prior to the explosion which took place there. Unfortunately, the report book which would have shown the daily state of the ventilation was very nearly destroyed by the second explosion, and they had now no means of getting at the facts. The last accumulation of gas which they could find out to have existed was on the 21st of June, 1876. In his opinion it was as much to the interest of the owners of the mine as it was to that of the public that a public inquiry should be made. He had followed the course which was usual to him in such matters. He had given instructions that counsel on behalf of the Home Office should attend the inquest.

QUESTION.

DR. LUSH asked the Secretary for War, Whether, seeing the continued indisposition to enter Her Majesty's Service in the Medical Department of the Army, evinced by the scarcity of applications for commissions, he can hold out any prospect of the condition of that service being improved; and, especially if he is prepared to place the Medical Officers upon the same footing as other officers with regard to exchanges?

MR. GATHORNE HARDY: Sir, considering the very short time the new system has been established, I do not consider 56 candidates a small number to have presented themselves since August last. Thirty-three passed through the school this month and will be duly commissioned, and 23 are now under examination. Further, it should be remembered that three Departments are competing at the same time for medical men, and that India, being the best paid, of course monopolizes the largest share. I may mention that the greater number of vacancies is caused by the retirement on half-pay through ill health of medical officers of 20 and 25 years' service. With regard to exchanges, I have on a former occasion stated to this House that each application is considered on its own merits, and the Director-General of the Army Medical Department uses discretionary power in recommending or refusing the indulgence, having due regard to the officers' services at home. In fact, no application has been refused when an officer has been at home under three years.

QUESTION.

MR. HOPWOOD asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether Mr. Ffrench, the British Chargé d'Affaires at Vienna, did in compliance with the Despatch of the Earl of Derby (p. 5, Turkey, No. 2, 1876,) make a "friendly representation" to Count Andrassy to induce the Cabinet of Vienna to take measures on the frontier to assist the Turkish Government in quelling the insurrection in Herzegovina; and, what, if any, was the reply of Count Andrassy; whether Ljubibratic, a leader of the insurgents, was not afterwards captured with others by the Austrian troops, as they alleged, but he denied, upon the Austrian frontier; whether Luka Petcovich, also an insurgent, was not taken from his sick bed in the hospital at Ragusa; and whether these and other insurgents similarly captured are still kept prisoners in Austria; and, if so, whether Her Majesty's Government would be disposed to make a friendly

MR. BOURKE: Sir, in answer to the first part of the Question, I have to point out that the instructions given to our Chargé d'Affaires at Vienna are not quite the same as the Question would seem to imply. Mr. Ffrench was directed to say to Count Andrassy "that Her Majesty's Government would be glad to learn that the Government of Austro-Hungary had taken steps to secure the peace of the frontier and to prevent the disturbances in Herzegovina from receiving support or encouragement from Austrian territory." It appears that Mr. Ffrench was unfortunately ill at the time and unable to leave the Embassy for 10 days, and there is nothing to show that he executed the instructions, though no doubt he did so. No reply from Count Andrassy is reported. Ljubibratic, and several others, were arrested by the Austrian troops on the 10th of March of the following year, 1876, and taken to Trieste. Afterwards, I believe, they were sent into the interior. An account of this is given in the Blue Book. No further official reports have been received respecting them, and no report respecting Luka Petcovich having been taken from a hospital. Her Majesty's Government do not intend to interfere in the matter, or to make any representations respecting it.

CUNLIFFE, A MINER.—QUESTION.

MR. MACDONALD asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether his attention has been directed to the case of Thomas Cunliffe, of West Houghton, county Lancaster, who was tried on Thursday, the 8th inst., before the Rev. J. S. Birley, on the charge of placing two tallies on two tubs that did not belong to him, value about one shilling and sixpence, and sentenced to three months' imprisonment with hard labour; whether the man was properly convicted; if guilty, whether the punishment was not excessive; and if it is true that the magistrate called out, as narrated in the "Bolton Chronicle," that the panel "would have a share of the treadmill?"

MR. ASSHETON CROSS said, that, in his opinion, the man was properly convicted, and the punishment was not excessive. It was not a case of stealing the tallies, but of taking a tally from one tub and placing it on another, by which he would get credit and pay for himself for the work done by a fellow-workman. He could not conceive a more disgraceful or a meaner act on the part of a collier, especially, under the circumstances, because the man who really worked the coal could never find it out. He should not, therefore, wonder if the magistrate had made use of the expression referred to, for he considered that he would have been justified in doing so.

THE ROYAL ACADEMY—SIR FRANCIS CHANTREY'S BEQUEST.—QUESTION.

MR. GOLDSMID asked the First Commissioner of Works, Whether it is correct that the Council of the Royal Academy have out of the interest of the funds bequeathed by the late Mr. Chantrey for that purpose, purchased a picture which is to be the property of the nation if suitable room is provided for it by the Government; and, if the statement is correct, to ask what course the First Commissioner proposes to follow?

MR. GERARD NOEL: Sir, when I saw the Question of my hon. Friend on the Paper I communicated with the Council of the Academy, and I am informed that negotiations are in progress for the purchase of a picture with the interest of the funds bequeathed by the late Sir Francis Chantrey. According to the will, about £2,500 a-year may be devoted to the purchasing of sculpture and works of art, but the will states—

“And it is my wish that the works of art purchased shall be collected for the purpose of forming and establishing a public national collection of British fine art in painting and sculpture, executed within the shores of Great Britain, in the confident expectation that whenever the collection shall become of sufficient importance the Government or the country will provide a suitable and proper building.”

Sir, at present there is ample room in the National Gallery for any pictures which may be purchased by the Trustees for the next few years. No doubt at some future time, when the collection increases, Her Majesty's Government must consider the propriety of providing a suitable home for the works of art acquired under the will of Sir Francis Chantrey, so that they may become the property of the nation.

INDIAN COOLIES—ISLAND OF REUNION.—QUESTION.

MR. ERRINGTON asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether it is true that the French Government has agreed to the appointment of a Joint Commission to consider the treatment of Indian Coolies in the Island of La Réunion; if so, whether he will state the scope of the proposed inquiry, and the names of the Commissioners to be appointed by Her Majesty's Government; and whether he will recommend the appointment of a similar Commission for Martinique, Guadaloupe, and Cayenne?

MR. BOURKE: Sir, the French Government have agreed to the appointment of a Joint Commission to inquire into the condition of Indian Coolies in La Réunion. Her Majesty's Government are not yet in a position to state what will be the scope of the proposed inquiry, inasmuch as we are in communication with the French Government on the subject, and no definite understanding has yet been come to. The Commissioners on the part of Her Majesty's Government have not yet been named. There is no present intention of appointing a Commission to inquire into the condition of Indian Coolies in Martinique, Guadaloupe, and Cayenne.

METROPOLITAN COMMONS—MITCHAM COMMON.—QUESTION.

MR. FAWCETT asked the President of the Local Government Board, Whether, if, as reported in the public journals, the local authorities of Croydon had decided to apply for permission to convert a hundred acres of Mitcham Common into a sewage farm, he will promise either to refuse the application, or not to grant it until the House has had an opportunity of expressing its opinion upon the proposed conversion to such a purpose of a considerable portion of a valuable open space near the metropolis?

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH, in reply, said, that no official communication had been made to him to the effect suggested by the Question. He had, however, seen in a newspaper a statement that the Rural Sanitary Authority at Croydon had it in contemplation to make such an application for 100 acres of Mitcham Common. It appeared by the same report that the consent of more than 100 persons would have to be obtained before such an application could be entertained, and, whatever his views might be, no order which he might make on the subject could take effect until it had been confirmed by Parliament. The hon. Member would, therefore, see that Parliament would have ample opportunity of expressing its opinion on the proposal.

THE MAGISTRACY, IRELAND—CASE OF MR. DEVLIN.—QUESTION.

MR. T. DICKSON asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland, If he will lay upon the Table of the House, Copy of the Memorial referred to by him on Friday, the 16th, as having been forwarded to the Lord Lieutenant of county Tyrone, in favour of the appointment of Mr. Devlin to the Magistracy, and the reasons then assigned by the Earl of Charlemont for declining to accede to the prayer of that Memorial when presented in the year 1874?

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH: Sir, I am unable to lay upon the Table a copy of the memorial forwarded to the Lord Lieutenant of county Tyrone, or of any reply he may have sent to it, because the documents in question are not, and never have been, in my possession, and I only quoted them, as I stated to the House on Friday, from a correspondence I had seen in the public Press. The particular memorial signed by the hon. Member for Dungannon (Mr. T. Dickson) was not the only one to which I referred; but I may take this opportunity of assuring the hon. Member that I had no intention of attributing to him any blame for having signed the memorial in question, much less of fixing on him any responsibility for an appointment which I believe was not made, as he states, until a considerable time had elapsed since the date of his signature. So far as I am aware, however, nothing had transpired up to the date of Mr. Devlin's appointment to the Commission of the Peace which could lead anyone to suppose that his position or qualifications had in any way changed since the date of the presentation of that memorial.

THE CONSTABULARY, IRELAND—DRILL AND GUARD MOUNTING.

QUESTION.

CAPTAIN NOLAN asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland, If battalion drill and guard mounting form part of the instruction of recruits at the Constabulary Depôt, Phoenix Park; and if so, whether these are ever practised by the policeman after he leaves the Depôt; and, having in view the alleged already too military character of the police, and the fact that their cost is credited exclusively to the Irish Civil Service Estimates, to ask if such instruction in battalion drill and guard mounting is to be continued?

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH: Sir, a few simple movements of battalion drill are taught to the recruits at the Constabulary Depôt in the Phoenix Park, such as are likely to be of use to them in their future service; for, as is well known, members of the Force are frequently called upon to act together in bodies of considerable size. There is no guard mounting parade, properly so called, but as there is a force of between 600 and 700 recruits continually receiving instruction at the depôt, and it is necessary to keep a proper supervision over the large amount of public property in the magazine, clothing stores, stables, and other buildings there, guards are mounted for this purpose. I know of no way in which such supervision could better be provided than by the members of the Constabulary Force themselves.

SOUTH AFRICA—CONFEDERATION OF THE CAPE COLONIES—THE TRANSVAAL REPUBLIC.—QUESTION.

MR. GOURLEY asked the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, If he will state what progress has been made in the recent negotiations between the Home Government and Governments of the Cape Colonies towards confederation; if he will inform the House the nature of the instructions given to Sir Theophilus Shepstone with reference to his mission to the Transvaal Republic; and, if the Government have considered the desirability of annexing, by negotiation or otherwise, the Transvaal Settlements?

MR. J. LOWTHER: Sir, the Secretary of State has transmitted to each of the States and Colonies concerned a copy of the draft Bill which he has prepared for enabling the confederation of the Colonies and States in South Africa to be effected, and he is awaiting the expression of their opinion on the measure. Sir Theophilus Shepstone was directed to inquire into the causes which brought about the war between Sococoeni and the Transvaal, to render all good offices with the view of putting an end to it, to confer with Her Majesty's High Commissioner, and to take such steps as may be necessary for the promotion of British interests and the protection of Her Majesty's possessions in South Africa. Her Majesty's Government are of opinion that it would be greatly to the interest of the Transvaal Republic, as well as the British Colonies, that the Republic should come under the British flag, and Lord Carnarvon has invited the opinion of the President upon the draft Bill for the Confederation of the South African Colonies and States, of which the Republic would form a part.

THE RUSSIAN FLEET IN THE PACIFIC. QUESTION.

CAPTAIN PIM asked the First Lord of the Admiralty, Whether his attention has been drawn to the following statement in the "Times" of the 1st February:—

"Russian Ships of War.—'A. M.' sends us a note, dated January 9, received by him from San Francisco on Wednesday morning:—'There is a fleet of thirteen Russian corvettes in the bay here;'"

whether the account in the "Globe" of the 13th January, headed "Russian Fleet in the Atlantic and Pacific" is correct, that—

"In the event of war being declared between England and Russia this fleet of eleven war vessels would assuredly paralyse the grain trade of this Country and disorganise our food supply. To oppose these eleven Russian war vessels England has but seven ships in the Pacific, carrying but fifty-six guns, viz., the 'Repulse,' 12; 'Amethyst,' 14; 'Opal,' 14; 'Fantome,' 4; 'Albatross,' 4; 'Daring,' 4; 'Rocket,' 4. The four gunboats are only 100 tons larger than the 'Goshawk,' and the latter is unfit for ocean cruising. It remains, therefore, that the Russians, if they care to soar above capturing our grain ships, can oppose eleven vessels to our seven;"

and further, in the "Globe" of the 6th February, under the head "Deserving Official Attention," that—

"Owing to Esquimaux being but poorly defended, 'the Russian fleet could easily beat down upon it and with very little opposition seize it and its valuable stores;'" and, whether he will inform the House if any precautions have been taken or preparation made to guard against disaster (in the event of war) to our colony and shipping in the Pacific?

MR. HUNT: Sir, the information at my command does not agree with that quoted by the hon. and gallant Member. It is to the effect that on the 24th of January there was at San Francisco a Russian squadron, consisting not of 13 corvettes, but of one corvette, two gunvessels, and three gunboats. The hon. and gallant Member seems by his Questions to anticipate an outbreak of war between this country and Russia. That is an anticipation in which I do not share, our relations with that Empire being of a friendly character. Should, however, British interests be threatened from any quarter or in any part of the globe, I hope the House will rely upon Her Majesty's Government taking proper steps to afford them protection.

THE RAILWAY COMMISSION. QUESTION.

SIR COLMAN O'LOGHLEN asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, If it be the fact that since the month of July last the Railway Commissioners have been sitting without the assistance of a Legal Commissioner; if it be the intention of the Government to fill up the vacant office of Legal Railway Commissioner; and, if so, when is it probable the appointment will be made?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER, in reply, said, that owing to the illness of Mr. Macnamara, the Railway Commissioners had since the month of July been sitting without a legal Commissioner. The Civil Service and Legal Profession had sustained a heavy loss in the death of that gentleman. It was the intention of the Government to fill up the vacant post, and he understood that the appointment, which was one made by Her Majesty's Sign Manual, would very shortly take place.

METROPOLIS—THE PUBLIC OFFICES. QUESTION.

SIR CHARLES RUSSELL asked the First Commissioner of Works, Whether

some arrangement cannot be made for placing on all Government offices in a conspicuous place the names of such office, with a view to giving facilities to the public who have business to transact there?

MR. GERARD NOEL, in reply, said, he must admit that it was difficult for the public to distinguish one public office from another, a small brass plate being in most cases their only guide. He had therefore given orders to have the names of the different offices traced distinctly over the doors, by which means he hoped the inconvenience at present felt would be obviated.

PALACE OF WESTMINSTER—THE LADIES' GALLERY.

QUESTION.

MR. SERJEANT SHERLOCK asked the First Commissioner of Works, Whether an arrangement can be made to restore to the ladies who visit the Ladies' Gallery of this House the waiting-room of which they were deprived last year, and the loss of which has given rise to general complaints on their part?

MR. GERARD NOEL, in reply, said, he deeply regretted that the ladies who attended the deliberations of the House should have any cause to complain of the want of accommodation afforded; but he would look into the matter and see if any arrangement could be made which would insure their comfort.

PUBLIC HEALTH—VACCINATION.

QUESTION.

MR. BARRAN asked the President of the Local Government Board, If his attention has been called to an inquest held in Leeds, on Monday 12th February, upon a child, infant daughter of William Perkins, alleged to have died from vaccination, the medical certificate being, primary cause vaccination; and to statements that erysipelas frequently follows vaccination, thereby causing the death of many children; and, whether he intends to take steps to inquire into these cases, with a view to giving security to parents, who are compelled by Law to have their children vaccinated?

MR. SCLATER-BOTH, in reply, said, his attention had been called to the death of a child at Leeds, which was alleged to have been due to vaccination, and he had caused inquiries to be made on the subject. The vaccination, it appeared, had been performed, not by a public officer, but by a private practitioner, and at the inquest which was held the jury found that the child had died from erysipelas, but did not agree as to how the erysipelas had been caused. The child after vaccination had received an injury which accounted for the difference of opinion among the jury. He might observe that the lymph with which the child had been vaccinated had been used in other cases without prejudicial results. When cases of this kind occurred it was his invariable practice to institute an inquiry into the circumstances attending them. He had received a report on the Gainsborough case, to which he referred the other day, and had laid it on the Table. He believed it would illustrate similar cases, and be useful in showing how bad after-effects sometimes followed vaccination as they did other operations.

METROPOLITAN ASYLUM DISTRICT BOARD.

MOTION FOR A SELECT COMMITTEE.

MR. RITCHIE, in rising to call the attention of the House to the proceedings of the Metropolitan Asylum District Board with reference to the establishment of a temporary Small Pox Hospital in Dod Street, Limehouse, and to move—

said, that the Petition with which he was entrusted had been signed by 63,000 persons, who complained of the proceedings of the Metropolitan Asylum Board, and it pointed out the injuries inflicted by these proceedings on employers and employed in the district where the Asylum Board had established their small-pox hospital. He would treat this hospital as being what it was now called, temporary, though he doubted whether it was intended originally to have a temporary character, as the Board had expended £7,000 upon it. The proceedings of the Board had been most unjustifiable, and no worse place could have been chosen for the purpose of a hospital. If the Board had taken advantage of all the means at their disposal there would have been no necessity for such a step as they had taken, which had led to so much alarm in the East of London. There had been some excuse for the Board not being prepared to deal with the outbreak in 1871, inasmuch as they had been appointed only two or three years before that time; but their neglect of the matter in the subsequent years could not be regarded in the same light. In the year before last a Select Committee of this House found that the Board had obtained two sites—one at Fulham and the other at Deptford—which it was intended to use for small-pox hospitals, and the choice of those sites met with general approval. In October last, however, when the disease was again becoming prevalent, nothing whatever had been done towards building hospitals on these sites, and the Board was no more prepared to deal with an outbreak than they had been at the time when the Select Committee sat. On October 14 they held a meeting, at which a letter from the Local Government Board was read, urging that the building at Deptford should be proceeded with, but it seemed to be thought that there was no particular hurry for coming to a decision on the matter. The letter was referred to a committee, but he could not find that anything further was done till November 18. On that date the disease having meanwhile been spreading very seriously, there came another letter from the Local Government Board, this time urging the erection of temporary buildings at Fulham and Deptford. Treating it as they seemed to treat all communications from that quarter, the Board considered the letter, but determined, instead of following its advice, to take in tenders with a view to the erection of permanent buildings at those places. Imagine a captain when shipwreck was imminent telling his carpenter to build a lifeboat, instead of merely putting together a raft. Such conduct would very much resemble that of the Asylum Board. On the 2nd of December the Managers began at last to take alarm, and resolved to stop the permanent buildings and begin temporary ones, and if they had gone about it in the right way the hospitals might have been ready in about three weeks, and there would have been no necessity for the temporary hospital at Limehouse, but practically the buildings were rather of a permanent kind, with great columns of brick, which required some time to dry, the other parts being of iron. On January 8, a committee of the Board reported that, with a view to a temporary hospital, they had fixed upon the building at Limehouse, the rental of which was £2,000, and which would require an expenditure of about £5,000 to fit it for a hospital. There was, he might add, no special reason why the hospital should have been established at Limehouse, for it was not intended for the inhabitants of the locality, but for convalescent patients from all parts of London. That being so, he would ask the House to consider for a moment the suitability of the present site. There was nothing, he maintained, in the air or neighbourhood which recommended it as a good place for the recovery of patients; rather the reverse, for the hospital was situated on the banks of a canal which was stagnant, with what was known as the parochial dust-yard close by, as well as chemical works which gave forth vapours all round. Again, if any one thing had been made more clear than another before the Committee to which he had referred it was the necessity of isolation in such cases as that of small-pox, but the street in which the hospital stood was only 12 yards wide, and the building itself abutted on the pavement for the whole of its length of 200 feet, while the front was studded with windows. There was no space between those who passed along the street and the hospital, and the end wall of the hospital formed also one of the walls of a dwelling-house. There was also a large number of factories on the spot, in which 2,000 girls were employed in making up woollen clothing, principally for the Army and Navy, and he was informed that as many more came there to take away work to their own houses. There were, besides, various parochial mission-rooms and other institutions, and a number of dwelling-houses which were let out in lodgings to seafaring men. It was evident, therefore, that there was not in the street a single element of isolation, and that the employments pursued in it were more calculated to convey infection than almost any other which he could name. Then, again, there was great laxity in the management of convalescent patients. Before the Select Committee on the

Hampstead Hospital it was proved that they were allowed to sit on the walls surrounding the building, to indulge themselves in smoking, and thus every opportunity was given for spreading the disease as widely as possible. Dr. Letheby, who was examined, expressed his decided opinion that such an hospital ought not to be erected or used in the neighbourhood of houses or even of a public road; but in this case it was in the midst of a population numbering thousands, and so close to houses that the people living in those opposite the hospital could look right into the wards and see the patients put into bed. Dr. Brewer, who was Chairman of the Asylum Board, and had been a Member of that House, stated before the same Committee that panic and fear greatly contributed to the danger of catching the disease. Dr. Letheby, whom he had already quoted, stated that people passing the hospital were liable to catch the disease, and in this manner contagion spread; that that statement was not a matter of mere opinion, but a fact, for everyone knew that the breathings and even close contiguity of patients labouring under small-pox were calculated to extend and spread the disease in every direction. But that was not all. The attention of the managers of the Asylum Board being called to the danger of persons visiting their friends, Sir William Wyatt stated that no regulations could prevent those visits. The fear which had seized the inhabitants of the neighbourhood in question was, under the circumstances, he contended, not a groundless fear, for he held in his hand a certificate drawn up and signed by 24 doctors and surgeons in the East-end of London who condemned in the most unqualified manner the institution of which he was speaking, and gave it as their opinion that it was placed in a position fraught with the greatest risk to the whole neighbourhood. Even supposing that a hospital was necessary, he had shown that the site was the most unsuitable which could have been chosen, and many other places might have been selected which were open to none of the objections he had been urging. But, was a hospital necessary at all? Evidently, in the opinion of the Asylum Board itself, there existed no paramount necessity for one, for, in the original agreement for this warehouse, the owner insisted on having a clause inserted exonerating him from any action at law that might hereafter be brought, but that was declined, as the Asylum Board refused to take upon themselves any responsibility, however remote the contingency; but, although unwilling to take on themselves this small risk, they did not hesitate to subject this populous neighbourhood to the risk attending the establishment of such a hospital in their midst, and the manufacturers and works to an additional pecuniary loss far in excess of any liability that would have been incurred by the Board. From the refusal on the part of the Board to accept the premises at all unless the objectionable clause was withdrawn, as was decided at their meeting of the 6th January, he contended that, in their opinion, no paramount necessity existed for the hospital at all. If any temporary accommodation had been required to meet the immediate wants of the metropolis, there were plenty of expedients which might have been adopted, and which, in fact, were adopted in 1871. The street where the hospital stood was the very centre of the London woollen manufacture, which gave employment to thousands of hands, and the neighbourhood would, in consequence of the hospital, be deprived of the benefits arising from the industry which had grown up in its midst, while the manufacturers would, of course, sustain heavy pecuniary losses. The agitation against the hospital was orderly and law-abiding, and there was not the slightest pretext for saying that the persons engaged in it conducted themselves otherwise than in a right and proper way. The people naturally turned to the Local Government Board, and a deputation was appointed to wait on his right hon. Friend the President of the Local Government Board. A great impression was made on his right hon. Friend's mind with reference to the unsuitability of the building, but he had already given his consent, and could not be induced to reverse the decision he had arrived at, though he promised to do his utmost to insure that the hospital should not be used except in the very last extremity. An appeal was also made to the Asylum Board, but without avail. A curt answer was received from them to the effect that the building was necessary. Then a public meeting was held. Sir Edmund Hay Currie, a member of the Asylum Board, attended it, and was apparently convinced by the representations which were made that the place was not a suitable one for the hospital, and he said—"If you leave the matter to me I will undertake to provide another place within a fortnight, and the small-pox patients will not be brought to Limehouse at all." Unfortunately, that promise was not fulfilled. A second deputation to the Asylum Board asked that there might be a week's delay before the patients were put in it, but even this moderate request was not complied with, but Sir William Wyatt said they could not undertake at that moment to set aside the hospital, but, although he could make no promise, the hospital might not be required at all. Sir Edmund Hay Currie made a statement to the same effect, and Dr. Brewer said there were at that moment 41 vacant beds at the Hampstead Small-pox Hospital; and he also stated that it was quite possible the hospital might not be used at all. Another member of the Board said he had been told that not more than five or six people were seen to pass the place where the hospital stood in the course of the day, and if he had known the circumstances he would never have consented to the hospital being there at all. The deputation, after such statements as these, left in the hope that after all the hospital might not be used, but what happened? The deputation waited on the Asylum Board on a Saturday, and to their astonishment six small-pox patients were received there on the following Monday, and that while there was accommodation for patients at the Hampstead Hospital. There were then 838 beds occupied of the 900 at the disposal of the Asylum Board, so that there were upwards of 60 beds vacant for patients. He could only conclude, in the face of such conduct, that the Metropolitan Asylum Board treated the representations of the inhabitants of Limehouse and those who represented them with contempt. And what was the result? Why, that the manufacturing interests of the neighbourhood were seriously injured, and that large numbers of workpeople, alarmed for themselves and families, left their work. The statements of numerous poor persons, many of them females, were taken down. They were simple, but touching. The people were struck with panic, and would rather run the risk of being deprived of their bread than stay at work beside this hospital. They stated that they saw the poor patients carried into the hospital in blankets, and they presented a shocking appearance. One person who was the father of a family, and who, in addition to his own family, had lodgers, on whom he depended to a considerable extent for the support of his family, declared that, as a Christian man, he could not expose them to the danger of catching the disease. There was another objection to the hospital being retained in the neighbourhood of Limehouse—namely, that it was the resort of a great body of sailors who lodged there and who would be exposed to the contagion, and might carry it with them to sea. In fact, the most serious consequences were certain to result from it. He received a letter from a gentleman who had property in the same street, and who said that since the hospital had been opened tenants who paid him £400 a-year rent had sent him notice to quit. The constitution of the Asylum Board was such that it was practically irresponsible. It was constituted under Mr. Gathorne Hardy's Act of 1867, one-third of the body being nominated by the Local Government Board and two-thirds elected in a very indirect way by Boards of Guardians. He hoped that, as the result of this discussion, the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Sclater-Booth) would prevent any other patients from being sent into this hospital, and that he would also assent to the appointment of a Committee to inquire into the constitution and powers of the Asylum Board. They did not appear to have any consideration for the public in what they did. In fact, one of the members of the Board had boasted that they had never altered their plans in response to any representations of the public. They did not appear to hold themselves responsible either to the Local Government Board or the ratepayers, and they appeared to treat any remonstrances either from the one or the other with the same indifference. Then their powers with regard to acquiring land were far too large. If a cemetery was to be opened, notices were required under the Standing Orders to any occupiers of dwelling-houses within 100 yards of the site. But this Board went secretly and acquired land or buildings in any part of London without notice to anybody, the result being to destroy the trade of the district and greatly to depreciate the value of property there. Such powers were far too large. There ought to be some co-operation with local authorities in procuring a site for purposes of a hospital, and objections to the site chosen should be properly heard. It might be said that if this were done the Board would be able to get no site at all. But the Local Government should have the power of hearing both sides, and of deciding which of the two parties was in the right. Those were the reasons why the people of Limehouse asked for a Committee of that House to be appointed to investigate the matter with the view of having this establishment closed at once for the sake not only of their own districts, but of the metropolis generally. Having appealed in vain to the Asylum Board, and having appealed equally in vain to the Local Government Board, they now came to that House feeling sure that however humble they might be the House would not reject a petition which had truth and justice on its side. The hon. Member concluded by moving for the appointment of a Select Committee.

MR. SAMUDA, in seconding the Motion, said, that it was one which seemed to him most appropriate for the House of Commons to take into consideration. The chief question before the House was how far the power of the Asylum Board ought to be controlled in the future. He agreed with every word his hon. Friend had uttered on the subject. He himself had taken part in that most important improvement in the Poor Law, carried through that House by the present Secretary of State for War, which, among other things, provided for the appointment of the Asylum Board, and that on the ground that he thought it would be the very best thing that Parliament could accomplish. Prior to the establishment of the Board the infirmaries were crowded with poor people suffering from various diseases; and the intention of the Bill was to separate the aged from the diseased, and that the Asylum Board should be furnished with power to select the very best and most appropriate places out of London for the reception of patients suffering from infectious diseases; but the Asylum Board took a course the very reverse of that for which they had been appointed, and instead of taking illness out of London, they actually took a course to bring it into its most densely populated districts. They could not possibly have selected a place less suited for a small-pox hospital than Limehouse, the chief part of the population of which it was composed were seafaring men, who were peculiarly liable to the small-pox, which, perhaps, would not reveal itself among those infected until they got to sea, when it would develop itself with disastrous results to all on board. It appeared to him, therefore, either that the Asylum Board was acting in opposition to the intention of the Act, or else that there was the greater necessity for inquiring into the powers of the Board. He did not believe that a well-intentioned Board like the Metropolitan Asylum Board was aware of the mischiefs that were likely to result from their acts when they selected this narrow street in a densely populated district for their small-pox hospital, the effluvia from which would pass down the drains into the sewers, and so into the street through the different openings. Had the Board been required by the Act to put themselves into communication with the local authorities they would have had all these things brought under their notice; and if, after having been fully informed of the facts, they had still persisted in their proceedings, those who were opposed to them would have been acting properly in applying to the right hon. Gentleman opposite. He had, however, no doubt, from what he had heard, that the Asylum Board would like to withdraw from their position had they not already committed themselves to the extent of £2,000 per annum for the rent of the warehouses and £5,000 for the cost of the fittings of the hospital. It appeared to him that this Committee, if appointed, might advantageously go considerably further than the hon. Member opposite proposed, and might make it a condition that the Asylum Board should in quiet times select suitable places for such hospitals; that the hospitals should not be permanent, but huts should be used similar to those constructed for the temporary residence of soldiers in camp; and that the huts should be destroyed when the disease had died out. He trusted the Government would not refuse the appointment of the Select Committee moved for. He felt that a great deal was to be done, and that a great deal of good might come out of the inquiry by a Committee; and with regard to his own district, Limehouse, that the hospital, which was surrounded by the dwellings of 20,000 or 30,000 people, would be closed against the reception of small-pox patients, for whom an appropriate situation might easily be found.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a Select Committee be appointed to inquire into the constitution, powers, duties, and proceedings of the Metropolitan Asylum District Board."—(Mr. Ritchie.)

MR. SOLATER-BOOTH said, he thought it would be more convenient if at that time he made a few observations, because other hon. Members wanted to speak on the subject, and after what he had to say they might be in a better position to do so than they were at present. He wished, in the first place, to set right some misconceptions. He could not for a moment complain of his hon. Friend for bringing this subject under the attention of the House, because he knew how deep were the feelings which had been excited among his hon. Friend's constituents respecting this hospital; but he did not think that any useful purpose could now be served by the appointment of a Committee on the subject. Although it was quite competent for the House to take upon itself these inquiries, yet, under the circumstances, there was nothing of a material character for the House to inquire into, and there was no case for the Committee, unless there were wider and deeper evils than had yet been alluded to, and some more practical object to be gained than he had yet heard. The Committee, in his opinion, was unnecessary, because it was not a year since a Committee on the same subject was appointed by the House, when it was proposed to establish a small-pox hospital at Hampstead—the case as to which was much stronger than that at Limehouse, because at Hampstead the Board had made a permanent purchase of land, whereas the occupation of the building at Limehouse was intended to be only temporary. The purpose of the Asylum Board had been almost accomplished, and he should deprecate very much the appointment of a Committee with a view to its perhaps recommending three months hence that which in all probability would be done in a few days. The evidence of the Hampstead Committee showed that infectious hospitals were not in themselves necessarily a source of danger to the adjoining district, and in concluding their Report that Committee submitted to the House whether compulsory powers of purchase should not be conferred on the Asylum Board, with corresponding powers of compensation, in accordance with the provisions of the Land Clauses Act. That was a practical suggestion, and if the Metropolitan Poor Act were before the House for revision, he would import the insertion of some such provision, but the concession of such powers would bring an enormous burden upon the ratepayers. The insufficiency of the accommodation at the disposal of the managers caused the necessity of setting up the temporary hospital at Limehouse, but, on the other hand, the ratepayers had been saved from the expense of maintaining two hospitals without any patients in them, and he might mention that in the summer of last year he received an application to close one of the two small-pox hospitals and dismiss the medical officers, because it was then thought that there were symptoms that the disease was dying out. From that time, however, symptoms of the disease began to manifest themselves anew, and, as had just been said by his hon. Friend, in the months of July, August, and September they continued to increase. He need not follow his hon. Friend into all the charges that had been brought against the Asylum Board. They had a painful, offensive and most thankless task to provide means for the extermination of this fearful disease at great risks to themselves, as he perfectly well knew. They had to do their duty to the whole of the ratepayers of the metropolis, and that duty had been most admirably accomplished, and as far as he knew without any dissatisfaction to the ratepayers. He would say at once that if the hospitals at Fulham and Deptford had been in operation in October and November, there would have been no occasion for the temporary arrangement at Limehouse, and this arrangement was only projected because the accommodation at the disposal of the managers would not enable them successfully to stamp out the disease. They were found fault with, because they proceeded to the erection of a permanent place, whereas they should have opened a place of a temporary kind. He should have been glad if that policy had been accepted, but one of the most experienced of the managers had told him (Mr. Sclater-Booth) that nothing would induce him to undertake the responsibility of working in huts again, on account of the difficulty of keeping up a uniform temperature in places constructed of wood and felt, besides the risk from fire which was involved. He was surprised at the allegations, therefore, that were made against the Board. What was the position of affairs now? The two places about which so much had been said were now upon the point of being ready for the reception of patients, and in the course of a week from that time as many as 240 beds would be at the disposal of the management, and they would not only be enabled to relieve Limehouse, but to restore the fever hospital at Homerton to its legitimate use. His hon. Friend said there was no occasion to make use of it, because there was room at Hampstead and Stockwell. He might, however, remind the House that for some time before cases had been refused admission into those hospitals, and it was evident that the managers would have incurred grave responsibility, if under those circumstances they had not put the few cases in this district into the place where alone they could be put. Although the number of cases in the present outbreak had not been so great as in 1871, he might say that the type of the disease had been as bad as could be well conceived, and when it was found that there was as many as 200 patients unprovided for he could not wonder that they should have found it inconsistent with their duty to abstain from using the place at Limehouse. The managers having no means of obtaining sites for the erection of hospitals except under the provisions of the Act, which gave, in fact, no power at all, they appealed to the Department to place a workhouse at their disposal, and he (Mr. Sclater-Booth), convinced by the arguments that were used, had done so, but the Guardians were able to resist their taking possession. It seemed to him to have been very well adapted for the purpose. The building at Limehouse was not like a row of houses in a street. It was a quadrangle. There were houses in front, but at either end none touched. It was said that there were 50 windows looking out upon the street, but all he could say was that the ground floor was not used by patients at all, for they were only treated on the first floor, and at the back part of the premises. As all, or nearly all, were convalescent, it seemed to him that the objections to the place from a sanitary point of view were reduced almost to a minimum. He had visited the place himself, and was convinced of the urgency of the appeal that had been made to him in December. The managers had only 60 beds at their disposal, and from every appearance at the time it was probable that all of them would be occupied within a week. He admitted that being near to the Limehouse Canal it would be an improper place for the treatment of patients in hot summer months, but having no other means of provision at hand, he was unable to resist the case which was made out for the taking of this place as a temporary hospital. That being so, and the fact becoming known, there was a rising in the neighbourhood, and especially in the street adjoining. He had been kept acquainted from day to day, almost from hour to hour, with the course of that agitation, and he had no wish to say a word against it; but, at the same time, he must state his own conviction that the agitation had been founded on a fallacy. Still, the fact that in the district there were a great number of factories and workshops, and the possibility of terror of the disease spreading among the workpeople, ought to have been taken into account. The representations that were made to him by the deputation that the interests of the industrial classes of the neighbourhood might be injured made a great impression on his mind. He conveyed that impression to the Asylum Board, and desired it to be made fully known to them that he considered they would be better discharging their duty by refraining from using the building, if they found it practicable, for a few days longer, notwithstanding that they had spent so much money upon it. He thought, however, that the health of the community would not in the slightest degree have been prejudiced by the use of the building. The health of the community was, in point of fact, more prejudiced by a case of small-pox which broke out in a private house, and it might have spread far and wide on account of the class of people living there. When the new hospitals at Fulham and Deptford were completed, as they would be in a week, the accommodation then available would in all human probability be in excess of the requirements of the public. From that time patients would be sent into those two hospitals. The convalescent patients would be discharged in the course of three weeks he hoped, and the next step would be to clear out at Homerton Hospital if it was found possible to do so. Passing by the imputations that had been cast upon the managers, who had done their best, and for which the metropolis should be grateful, he came to the question whether a Committee should be appointed. First of all, he would ask, was it required to put down the practical grievance before them? He thought the House would be unwise to appoint a Committee to deal with a difficulty which was being terminated in another way. Would it be proper to appoint a Committee to inquire into the constitution and efficiency of this Board? If he were to detail all that the Board had done, not only in the fearful business of small-pox—for that after all was but a very small part of what they had done and what they were doing—he thought the House would be of a different opinion. Suppose he were to advert to what they had accomplished for the 5,000 pauper lunatics, who must either have been committed to private asylums or kept in workhouses. From that policy the most happy results had followed. He had, he hoped, said enough to show to the House that the time had gone by for the suggestion of a Committee. They would have accommodation at their disposal more than sufficient for any outbreak of disease that was likely to occur. His hon. Friend had said that the Board was not representative, but it had achieved great success; and though its proceedings had been reviewed by many writers well acquainted with the subject, there was no fault to find with them. He was free to admit that the relation between them and the Vestries was indefinite, and in some senses unsatisfactory, and there were many things that might be remedied; but he did not think that a

Mr. Selater-Booth

Committee was required to settle these matters. Besides, he deprecated the appointing of a Committee upon a question which after all belonged to a local authority recently appointed, and who so far had done very well, and when the grievance which it was to be called upon to deal with was really at an end. He hoped, therefore, the hon. Gentleman would feel that he had had ample opportunity of saying all he had to say on the subject, and would be satisfied with the result. He also hoped that the House would consider the explanation he had made satisfactory, and that the appointment of this Committee was quite unnecessary. He thought the hon. Gentleman's constituents would be indebted to him for having brought the subject before the House, and hoped he would be satisfied with the manner in which it had been treated and not press his Motion.

MR. HARDCASTLE observed that the power which the Metropolitan District Asylum Board possessed of importing small-pox patients into a crowded neighbourhood was of more than local interest and that there ought to be some check upon it. The present site ought to have been one of the last chosen by a public body and seemed to be more objectionable than that of Hampstead Hospital, which was situated in a large and open area. As for wooden sheds, the experience of Manchester showed that such structures might be made thoroughly warm and comfortable. In connection with the Infirmary there some wooden sheds had been erected to which no objection whatever could be taken on the score of warmth or ventilation.

MR. WALTER said, he hoped the hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets (Mr. Ritchie) would be content with the expression of opinion which he had elicited on the subject and not press for the appointment of a Committee. It so happened that, from the circumstance of having friends who were interested in Limehouse, he (Mr. Walter) took the trouble that afternoon to pay a visit to the locality, in order to judge of the matter from the testimony of his own eyes and ears. He was bound to say that, having gone to Limehouse with great prejudices against what had been done, and in the expectation of finding something very terrible, he was very much staggered by the real aspect of the place. Dod Street, which was 200 or 300 yards in length, was within 100 yards of Commercial Road, one of the most airy and open thoroughfares in the metropolis. It opened out of a wide thoroughfare leading into Commercial Road, and consisted principally of the large buildings which had been mentioned and an establishment for preparing Australian meat for the market, which was not being disturbed in any way by the presence of the hospital. The rest of the street was composed of small dwelling-houses, a small grocer's shop, and two gin shops. He went into one of these—probably the first gin shop he had ever entered in his life—and found that the people were not at all alarmed at the proximity of the hospital. They told him, however, that it was very unpopular in the neighbourhood. The other gin shop was quite at the other extremity of the street, and he did not think it worth while to enter it. In the small grocer's shop, the poor woman he questioned was not afraid of the hospital on her own account, but she said it had had the effect of driving away her customers, and it appeared to him that in cases of that kind it was a serious question whether compensation should not be paid. At the back of one of the buildings there was a stagnant canal, which was particularly offensive, but he found a very large open space occupied by timber yards, &c. Never in his life, indeed, had he seen anything less corresponding to his idea of a crowded neighbourhood — anything less like Seven Dials or some parts of Westminster, for instance. He said all this simply because he felt it his duty to do so, having no connection with Limehouse, and knowing nobody who lived there or who was connected with the District Board. He would not contend for a moment that that locality was a proper site for a permanent hospital, but so far as the temporary accommodation of patients was concerned, he felt bound to say that if he had been sent down to report upon it, he could not have objected to it, and he did not think under the circumstances that the District Board, of which he had no knowledge, and for which he had no special weakness, had shown any such indifference to the public interest or public convenience as had been alleged against them. He could not blame people for feeling somewhat uneasy at the presence of the hospital. At the same time he could say that if he himself lived in the street he should not be very much disturbed by it. Under the circumstances he believed the hon. Gentleman had gained his point in bringing the subject before the House, and he would, in conclusion, again express the hope that the Motion for the appointment of a Committee would not be pressed to a division.

MR. COLLINS remarked that the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Sclater-Booth) had failed to touch the essential point involved in this discussion, which was the power of the Asylum Board to establish centres of infection in any district of London, he would not say capriciously, but as they might think fit. After the statement of the right hon. Gentleman to the effect that the hospital would very shortly cease to be used, it would probably appear to the hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets unnecessary to press his Motion. At the same time it must be recognized that the hon. Member had done a service to the inhabitants of the metropolis by bringing the subject before the notice of the House.

MR. COOPE thought that the metropolis ought to be protected against the caprice of the Asylum Board, and in his opinion the Limehouse people had very great cause of complaint against them. He hoped the public would not again be subjected to such arbitrary proceedings. After the discussion, however, which had taken place he trusted that the hon. Member would withdraw the Motion.

MR. RITCHIE said, the debate had practically served the purpose he had had in view. He accepted the statement of the right hon. Gentleman, which he understood to be that so soon as the Deptford Asylum was ready no more patients would be sent into Dod Street, and that after those who were there became well they would be discharged, and the building not again used as a hospital for infectious disease. [Mr. SCLATER-BOTH intimated assent]. With this assurance he begged leave to withdraw his Motion.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

MOTION FOR A SELECT COMMITTEE.

CAPTAIN PIM rose to move that a Select Committee be appointed—

“To inquire fully into the present Admiralty organization and its system of departmental and general administration of the affairs of the Navy, as well as into the actual condition of the Navy and Maritime resources of the Country, to ascertain how far they meet the requirements of the Empire; and also into the administrative arrangements made by the First Lord of the Admiralty to insure the efficiency of the Naval Service, upon which depends the welfare and safety of the Kingdom.”

The hon. and gallant Gentleman declared that the proper administration of the Navy was not a Party question, and it was one of the deepest national importance. He was proceeding to remark that our squadrons in the China and Japan seas were out-numbered by those of other nations when—

(Mr. Cowper-Temple, Mr. Russell Gurney.)

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. COWPER-TEMPLE, in rising to move that the Bill be now read a second time, said, that its object was a reform of the procedure of the Ecclesiastical Courts, which had already occupied the attention of the Legislature for many years. The laws regulating these Courts and their fees rested on nearly 100 statutes, and almost all the 11 Bills to reform them which had been brought in at different times included the substance of the present Bill. Most of those Bills seemed to have failed because they attempted to deal at one stroke with a subject so wide and so complicated that it was not possible for any general agreement of the House to be reached in a single Session. What had been accomplished, which was much, was effected by dealing successively with separate parts of the whole. In this way ecclesiastical jurisdiction had been settled; and the part which remained was the procedure in non-contentious business, and the instruments, licences, and remuneration of officers in granting and registering those instruments. The difficulties and abuses that had arisen from time to time with respect to these things were so notorious that he need not dwell on that part of the subject. As long ago as 1832 a Royal Commission was appointed to inquire into them, which recommended a reduction of the fees and offices; and in 1850 a Committee of that House took evidence and made various recommendations. Amongst them was the following:—

“Your Committee have found from the whole of the evidence submitted to them that the sage precautions of the ancient civil and ecclesiastical laws against undue exactions of fees and the multiplication of offices have been practically disregarded; and your Committee recommend that payment of fees should be replaced by fixed salaries throughout the ecclesiastical establishments.”

No steps, however, were taken to give effect to that recommendation; and it appeared, from the Returns of the years following, that in 90 cases the official duties of registrars were performed by deputies; that 17 minors had been appointed registrars; that two ladies held the office, one of whom had been appointed at the early age of five years; and another registrar was insane. The office was held by patent for life, and it was practically impossible to remove the holders even for incapacity and misconduct. In the diocese of Bristol the deputy registrar made no distinction in his charges in Common Law business between what was due to him as an officer of the Court and his professional charges as a proctor. In other dioceses there was no table of fees, and in one diocese the chancellor had doubled all the fees, because he thought they were too small before. In that of Durham the public paid fees for the service of the registrar, who did no part of the business, and then had to pay also the deputy who did the work. In Rochester the office of registrar was formerly held by two clergymen, who each took a third of the fees, and the remaining third went to the deputy, who did all the work. In Bath and Wells the visitation fees which were due from each parish in the diocese were divided between the chancellor, the apparitor general, the registrar, the deputy registrar, and the deputy apparitor general. In 1869 another table was framed in which fees were granted to the secretary. The fees on collations, institutions, and licences received by the secretaries were larger than those of the registrars. Although the chief part of the judicial business had been removed from these Ecclesiastical Courts, the number of officers had not been diminished, and they made large charges, in addition to their fees, for small benefits conferred. The first of the two leading objects of the Bill was to reduce the number of officers to what was at present required; the second related to arrangements for their remuneration. The number of officers was obviously excessive. In one single diocese he had ascertained that the number of officers was 32. The work which was divided between them could be properly performed by two persons, the chancellor and the registrar, but the Bill contemplated its being done by four, the chancellor, the registrar, the secretary, and the apparitor; and taking the average of the officers in the various dioceses, the number of offices might be fairly and properly reduced without any disadvantage to a fourth of the number at present existing. The Bill contained a list of the officers in its Schedule who were to continue, the duties of the others being transferred to the offices which were retained. The changes necessary would be brought about as vacancies arose, no present holder of an office being disturbed in it. Commissaries would be abolished altogether, except as a mere temporary appointment made for special occasions. There was no security under the present system that a person appointed to discharge duties was fit by either experience or training to do so, but future appointments would not be permitted to be performed by deputies. The Bill would therefore provide a remedy in that respect. The officials of archdeacons would be abolished, and their duties transferred to diocesan officers, an arrangement which was not open to objection. But the important proposal of the Bill was that henceforth all payments should be made not by fees but by salaries, and for the purpose of apportioning regular salaries the fees must be paid into a common fund, which would be under the direction and responsibility of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners. These fees must be received by stamps, as the safest and easiest mode of taking no less and no more than was due; but where unforeseen difficulties might arise, it was provided that Rules and Orders might be issued by the Privy Council for dispensing with the use of stamps. The marriage licence fees which were granted as dispensations from banns varied in different dioceses. He presumed that the Orders in Council would make them uniform. The salaries of the officers who were to be retained was stated in the Schedule at a maximum amount; the total amounted to about £34,000, and a limitation would be placed on the amount to which they might be reduced. Since the abolition of church rates the difficulty had in- of inducing proper persons to take the office of churchwarden, because they had certain fees to pay and no fund out of which to discharge them, and no process of law could compel payment from an unwilling churchwarden. It was therefore proposed to abolish those fees payable at visitation. The Bill dealt with the fees paid by clergymen on institution to their benefices, but it did not specify them, it followed the precedent of previous Acts, and authorized the issue of tables of fees. He thought those fees ought to be reduced, and it was proposed to repeal those Acts which authorized tables of fees, in order that new tables of fees might be provided.

The persons who issued the tables of fees were, as before, the two Archbishops and the Lord Chancellor; but it was made competent to Her Majesty to name other Members of the Privy Council who were to be associated with the Lord Chancellor in the issue of these Rules and Orders. In reference again to the marriage fees, if these remained substantially the same, and if the Schedule passed, there would be a surplus available, which might reduce the fees paid by the clergy by 40 per cent. The existing officers were not injured pecuniarily, and there would be a proportionate equality amongst them as to the share they would receive out of the general fund. The Bill reserved for those officers who had accepted office before the Act of 5th and 6th Will. IV. the rights of compensation which that Act conferred upon them for any damage they might sustain. One clause might excite emotion in that House, the clause that provided a salary for the Judge who was now sitting in the Court of Arches a sum of £1,500 a-year. The attention of those interested in this subject had been drawn to a correspondence of Dr. Tristram, who had undertaken to protect the interests of registrars. Dr. Tristram's idea was, that they might guard against the re-introduction into the Bill of the provision for having fees taken by stamps instead of money, if he could persuade the chancellors and registrars to tax themselves voluntarily to an amount of from 3 to 5 per cent, but this ingenious suggestion had met with no response. The Bill was identical with the one which passed through the House of Lords last year, and it ought at least to receive respectful consideration, especially as it had passed unanimously with the approval of the Episcopal Bench and the Lord Chancellor. It was unfortunate that Her Majesty's responsible Advisers could not undertake this subject. Lord Cranworth, when he was Lord Chancellor, did propose a measure dealing with ecclesiastical offices and fees, but an opposition led by the Bishop of Exeter defeated the Bill; and since that date no Government had introduced Bills of this character, they had been left to the Episcopal Bench or to independent Members of Parliament. But although the Government were not ready to take the responsibility of proposing a measure of the sort, yet he was sure that the right hon. Gentleman who now represented the Government in that House, would feel that practically responsibility attached to him on this subject. They must admit the importance of removing the discredit attaching to the Church from the abuses of the civil administration of its offices; and he trusted they would secure for the Bill a full and impartial consideration. This measure of reform in the Church could not be opposed on its principles, and he was ready to justify its details in Committee. The right hon. Gentleman concluded by moving the second reading of the Bill.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Cowper-Temple.)

MR. RAIKES said, he wished to offer a few observations as an independent Member of the House, and not as in any way connected with the Government or any other organized body. No one would be unwilling to admit that the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Cowper-Temple), had stated his case very fairly in introducing the Bill; but at the same time, he (Mr. Raikes) thought there was some reason for complaint against those persons who agitated that question outside of the House for pushing forward the Bill in that particular shape at that particular moment. The measure provided for the reduction of ecclesiastical officers and the remuneration of the surviving officers; but another part of it related to the Provincial Judge, and he doubted very much whether, if the circular of Dr. Tristram had been more successful, this Bill would have appeared at the present moment in either House of Parliament; and he confessed that he thought it would never have seen the light at all if it had not been necessary to provide a larger salary for the Judge of the Arches Court. He considered that that Judge should have a suitable stipend; but he was at a loss to see why the salaries of other persons should be diminished in order that the stipend should be provided. When the Public Worship Regulation Act was proposed, the subject of that salary was withdrawn from it, and it was left to the generosity of the public, or the future wisdom of Parliament, to fill up the vacuum. He did not see why an Ecclesiastical Judge, whose appointment was regarded as of great public importance, should not be paid by the nation, or, if that was not acceptable, why should not the Archbishops and other members of the Episcopal Bench, who had always clamoured, if he might use that phrase, for the appointment of an Ecclesiastical Judge, be called upon to pay towards his salary. There were other grounds for deprecating the introduction of a Bill at this time in reference to these fees. The matrimonial laws would have to be amended, and the fees in respect to them would have to be dealt with; and, therefore, he thought they should wait before making the particular changes now proposed. Moreover, reference had been made in the Press to the supposed intention of the Government to bring in a Bill for the creation of new Sees, and it would be desirable to know what the new Sees were to be, before dealing finally with the matter now before the House, and the fees which would have to be paid to the officials. As to the payment of fees by churchwardens, he thought it would be desirable to abolish them. There were 10,000 parishes in England, and their churchwardens' fees, the collection of which was very difficult, formed a very small portion of the total of £40,000 collected. The payment of money by stamps would be a difficult matter to carry out all over the country, and he did not see that the Bill provided for it. He admitted that some of the proposals in the Bill would effect certain improvements, but he had suggested good reasons for pausing before they attempted to legislate. With respect to the Bishop's chancellor, they were told that in future he was always to be a person learned in the Civil Law. If that was to be construed literally, he supposed it would mean that he was to be a D.C.L., a degree frequently bestowed honoris causa, and which was not enjoyed by some of the first lawyers of the day. It would therefore be restrictive, for while it would, to a great extent, exclude the members of the English Bar from holding it, it would not prevent clergymen who had taken that degree from doing so. Beyond that, there were many well-qualified persons who had not the degree of D.C.L., while many who possessed it were wholly unqualified. Some Bishops seemed disposed to ignore the real duties of the office of chancellor, as in one case the chancellor had been appointed the head of a theological College, and that he considered was objectionable as the duties of two such offices were very different. The functions of the Court of the Bishop's chancellor in regard to the personal status of the clergy had been described as more analogous to those of a court-martial in regard to the personal status of officers of the Army than anything else, and he thought the Army would object strongly to having all matters relating to military discipline judged by the nearest magistrate. The clergy had a right to be heard before the appointment of clerical chancellors was done away with. He disliked the proposed union of registrar and Bishop's secretary, as the duties of the two officers were wholly distinct in practice. He granted that a Bishop's secretary ought to hold his office during pleasure; but he thought that the office of registrar, now held during good behaviour, and which was one of the best parts of our ecclesiastical system, had better be kept on its present footing. Upon the general question he wished to observe that there was a great disposition in the country to believe that these fees were excessive, that they pressed hardly upon the clergy in particular, and that they were received by pampered officials who did little and were largely paid; but, whatever might have been the case in former times, that was not so now. The large fees had been swept away by the Acts which constituted the Probate and Divorce Courts, and the registrars did not receive now more than from £500 to £600 a-year, and they did a large amount of work. In conclusion, the question before them, affecting as it did the position of a body of men not largely represented in the House, was one of considerable importance, and their interests ought not to be disposed of without careful consideration and further inquiry.

SIR WALTER BARTHELOT said, if there were one thing more clear than another to be learnt from the two speeches which they had heard, it was that there was an absolute necessity for a change in the law in regard to this subject. The measure proposed to abolish churchwardens' fees, which caused great dissatisfaction in the country, and that fact alone should commend the Bill to the consideration of the House. No doubt it would be highly improper to take away the emoluments of these different classes of persons, without giving them an opportunity of being heard; and remembering also that that was a question of much difficulty, it having been under consideration for some 30 years, he thought it could only be satisfactorily dealt with by practical men, and he should have greatly preferred it if the Home Secretary had taken its settlement in hand and brought in a well-considered measure on the subject. But, thinking as he did, that there was a want for the measure, he would venture to hope that it would be referred to a Select Committee, so that all parties whom it affected might have the opportunity he had referred to, and where everything would be well considered, and as this could be done early in the Session, he should hope to see a good Bill passed this year. Everyone who had read this Bill as it now stood, must come to the conclusion that in its present shape it was very objectionable, very unfair, and could not be allowed to pass.

MR. GOLDNEY congratulated the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Hampshire (Mr. Cowper-Temple) on having brought forward the Bill at so early a period of the Session, because it would give the House an opportunity of fully considering the subject. Other measures of the same kind had usually come down to that House at the end of July when it was impossible to consider them. Frequent attempts of late years had been made to deal with the subject, and in 1872 the right hon. Gentleman the present Home Secretary, before he held office, sought in an admirable manner to grapple with it. For a long time past there had been loud complaints against these ecclesiastical fees, which were often exacted for little or no real service performed. The sums now received by various ecclesiastical officials who filled places which had existed for a long period, but many of whose offices were now practically gone, amounted to about £80,000 a-year. Of that sum £40,000 came from marriage fees, about £15,000 from the clergy on admission to their benefices, £13,000 from visitation fees, £3,000 from consecration fees, and the rest from minor sources. In the various dioceses the secretaries of the Bishops received on the average about £400 a-year each; the chancellors about £300, the registrars about £800, and the apparitors and surrogates smaller sums. One officer did his work by deputy, another provided parchment, another provided the seal, another fixed the seal, and so on, the total amount they obtained from the public being, as he had said, no less than £80,000 per annum. The office of Bishop's secretary was entirely a modern creation, and those officers ought therefore to be paid either by the Bishops themselves, or from the funds in the hands of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, and certainly not by fees. It was absolutely necessary to have a Provincial Judge, and also in each diocese one chancellor; but they ought not to keep up useless offices in order to levy fees from the public for marriage licences and other matters, or from clergymen who were instituted into benefices, the new incumbent having, what with dilapidation charges and other expenses, quite enough to bear without that further impost. Much dissatisfaction was sometimes caused in respect to consecration, and in one instance a hon. Gentleman, a Member of that House, had built a church, and when the time came for its consecration the Bishop of the diocese could not attend and he had to apply to the Bishop of the adjoining diocese, who performed the ceremony; but the consequence was that the Gentleman who built the church had to pay the consecration fees twice over, once for each diocese. That was a specimen of the abuse of this system that required to be abolished. This measure had been introduced into the other House with the sanction of the Bishops, and, also, he understood, with that of a great number of the officials concerned, who were themselves willing to have their duties and their fees better regulated. Let the House, then, get rid of offices to which no work was attached, and only retain those in which real duties had to be performed. He thought the simplest mode of proceeding would be for the Ecclesiastical Commissioners to ask the Bishop what official aid he required, and then, having obtained duly qualified persons, to pay them for their services. They should do that now, without waiting for any prospective and undefined changes in the marriage laws, which had, after all, nothing to do with the matter now before them. He anticipated great benefit from referring the Bill to a Select Committee.

MR. BERESFORD HOPE, while recognizing the moderation and calmness of the hon. Mover, contended that there were incidents connected with the contents and with the introduction of the Bill which called for inquiry, and he trusted, therefore, that the Bill would be referred to a Committee which would have power to take evidence. He spoke especially to the letter, also referred to by his hon. Friend the Member for Chester, from Dr. Tristram, the chancellor of London, and therefore the highest but one of all our ecclesiastical Judges, and a man who was competent to know what he was talking about in such connection. His letter was not intended for publication, and therefore no doubt contained the undisguised and innermost thoughts of the writer—and there was something fresh and innocent in those inmost thoughts of so venerable a Judge. Dr. Tristram alleged that the whole intention of the Bill was to find a salary for Lord Penzance, and that if all the ecclesiastical officials would unite in a subscription for Lord Penzance, nothing more would be heard of the Bill. But the Bill had been heard of again, so clearly Dr. Tristram's scheme must have broken down. Still, there remained his statement, with all the weight of his authority; and there was the diametrically opposite statement of his right hon. Friend. A Committee was clearly needed for settling the question whether, as Dr. Tristram said, the 52nd clause was the Bill, and the rest merely what in the language of editors was called "padding;" or, as the right hon. Gentleman held, the rest of the Bill was the Bill, and the 52nd clause the "padding." The proposal to pay the Public Worship Regulation Judge by fees touched consciences and feelings, and was not to be measured by the simple amount of money involved, while, on the other hand, to abolish offices for the mere sake of cutting down something seemed to him poor economy. Then he thought the hon. Member for Chippenham had argued with less than his usual acuteness in protesting against consolidation, as if that were not the more convenient, while equally effective way of effecting reduction, while simple abolition would be alike rude and unsatisfactory. In regard to Lord Penzance, everyone who had the welfare of the Church at heart would regret to see the question of a revision of fees mixed up with the unfortunate controversy which had been raised in connection with the Public Worship Regulation Act, as if there were no other way of providing its Judge with his stipend. The appropriation of marriage and other fees to the payment of the Judge entrusted with the working of that Act would lead to much dissatisfaction. It aggrieved the laity, from whom the large amount in the way of marriage licence fees would proceed; and it aggrieved the clergy, who were called on to pay for a new penal jurisdiction created for their own "regulation" or, as they might think, oppression. How could the right hon. Gentleman justify his proposal to have the brand of discord lighted at the torch of Hymen? Or how would a clergyman on his induction enjoy being forced to help to pay the Judge by whom he might be expelled? Such a provision was like telling a man that the costs of his trial and conviction could be paid out of his own goods, like costs in a civil suit. Those most unhappy prosecutions which had recently agitated the Church, were the shame and the regret of all right-minded and quiet people; and yet they here attempted to impart the memorial of them into a statute which ought above all things to be kept free of strife and dissension. It was a very great mistake, he might even say a political blunder, to hamper the Bill with burning questions, and if only to raise it out of that atmosphere of contention, he should be glad to see it sent to a Committee having power to take evidence.

MR. MONK said, he rose principally to correct one or two inaccuracies that had occurred during the debate. His hon. Friend opposite (Mr. Beresford Hope) had wished Dr. Tristram to be examined, but if the hon. Gentleman had read the evidence that had been taken last year he would find the vicar general of the Province had been heard at great length. He was glad to see that the fees for the admission of churchwardens were abolished by the present Bill, and he agreed with his hon. Friend the Member for Chippenham (Mr. Goldney) that the fees for the institution of clergymen to benefices should also be done away with. He would admit that Bill had many excellent features; but it was one of so complicated a nature that a Committee of the Whole House could not fully examine its provisions. He was glad, therefore, that the Bill was going before a Select Committee; but he hoped it would not be necessary to take any evidence, as a large amount had already been collected. With regard to the amount of the fees, those who were competent judges estimated them at only £45,000 and the highest estimate he had ever seen was £52,000, instead of £80,000, the sum mentioned by the hon. Member for Chippenham; but however that might be, it was very desirable that certain of these fees should be abolished, and he therefore, as he had said, approved of the reference of the Bill to a Select Committee.

SIR JOHN KENNAWAY in supporting the Bill, wished to point out that undue haste and spoliation were not fair charges to make against the promoters of the measure. It had been open for discussion since last Session, and it dealt most tenderly with existing interests. The question really was whether the Bill was a fair way of remedying a grievance which had long existed. It proposed to abolish or amalgamate offices only as they fell vacant by death, or lapsed in other ways, by which means 409 offices could be reduced to 100. A great reduction of fees must naturally be expected to follow, and it was estimated that on the fees payable by clergymen on institution and induction alone there would be a reduction of 33 per cent. In view of the great benefits which the Bill promised it was thought proper to set apart a certain amount of fees to provide for an adequate salary for the Ecclesiastical Judge, and that was a question which might very well be considered by the Committee. As the Judge did his duty, it was only right that he should be properly remunerated; and it was to the interest of the Church that his status should be upheld. He agreed that the nation ought to pay the salary of the Judge, but so far this had not been proposed.

MR. WHITWELL expressed his satisfaction that the Bill had been brought forward. The sooner these questions were settled the better it would be for both the Church and the community generally, as delay would only tend to aggravate the difficulties. There should not be a strict limit placed to the taking of evidence before the Select Committee, because it was desirable that all the circumstances of the case should be dealt with after mature consideration.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS said, he could, at all events, speak on this question with an unbiased and unprejudiced mind, because long before the heated discussions which had arisen from a matter connected with one of the clauses in this Bill his attention had been called to the present subject. The more he looked into the question the more he was persuaded that, so far as the Ecclesiastical Courts were concerned, they were in the position in which all institutions were found that had not been reformed for a long period of years. Where there had been considerable neglect, the natural consequence was that a great sum of money was gathered from persons who could ill afford to pay it. To him it seemed as if a quantity of officers were appointed for the sole purpose of swallowing up the fees, and a quantity of fees imposed for the sole purpose of being swallowed up. He did not purpose to repeat the statements on the subject which he believed had met with the ready acceptance of the House in 1872, nor to endeavour to show that some large reform was necessary for the purpose of providing a remedy for the present state of things. He found that the Bishop of London introduced a Bill on the subject in 1847, another in 1848, and a third in 1849. The Government of the day then took up the question. The Lord Chancellor at that time (Lord Cranworth) brought in a measure for the purpose of regulating those Courts, and it was passed by a majority of 8. In 1869 Lord Shaftesbury introduced one Bill and the Archbishop of Canterbury another, and both were referred to a Select Committee. That Committee reported that one of the Bills should be proceeded with, but owing to want of time the Bill fell through. Lord Shaftesbury again brought the question forward in 1870, but as he was told that some information was required before it could be legislated upon, he had to put the matter off. He again brought it forward in 1871, but it could not be dealt with owing to the illness of the Archbishop of Canterbury. In 1872 he again introduced his Bill, and in the same Session he (Mr. Cross) brought it forward in the House of Commons. The hon. Member for Chester (Mr. Raikes) then made nearly the same speech as he had made to-day, and as he (Mr. Cross) could not concur with him in thinking that the time had not arrived for dealing with it in a satisfactory manner, it was hoped that, after those five years of grace which had intervened, his hon. Friend would be content that the House should now really proceed to business. There were many matters which would require the greatest possible consideration. He was aware that there were considerable interests concerned, and he readily admitted that those persons who now held the offices should have their interests duly and carefully examined into and respected. He must, however, entirely dissent from the proposition that because a person held a particular office he had not only a vested interest in it, but was entitled to have it continued for his satisfaction to future generations. He did not want to mix up considerations with regard to the case of Mr. Tooth, in connection with Clause 52, or to make any remarks which would give rise to controversy; but in 1872, long before the Act which had been referred to had been passed, he made a proposition that the fees in connection with the procedure in Ecclesiastical Courts required material alteration. He showed that there was one case in which the costs amounted to £5,000, and another in which they exceeded £8,000. It was quite clear that sums of that kind practically rendered any judicial decision impossible. Quite irrespective of that Act of Parliament, some reform was necessary in order to cheapen procedure and avoid actual waste of money. Far be it from him to say that in wishing to cheapen the procedure, he wished to increase the number of suits. He did hope that the common sense of England would set itself against much litigation. He thought that the fewer suits there were the better, and that common-sense men of all parties would agree with him in that opinion. When they came to look at the amount of fees which were levied, the number of officers, and the amount of business done, the contrast was conspicuous. In the Chancellor's and Registrars' Courts the number of cases in 1869 was 12, and in 1870 it was only six. They did not want a very extravagant staff for that amount of business. This question had been before Parliament over and over again, and he wanted the House now to face it. He would, therefore, request that the Bill should be referred to a Select Committee, not with the view of shelving it, but with the view of remedying some of the defects to which reference had been made.

Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and, on the Motion of Mr. ASSHETON CROSS, ordered to be referred to a Select Committee.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Select Committee have power to send for persons, papers, and records."—(Mr. Beresford Hope.)

MR. COWPER-TEMPLE thought it would be a great mistake to agree to the proposal.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS said, it was not requisite that the Committee should have power to summon witnesses from every part of the United Kingdom, because the only result of such a proceeding would be that the whole question would be gone into, and the Bill be thrown over. It might be that the Select Committee, when they considered the Bill, might ask leave of the House to take evidence upon certain points. In the first instance, he was quite satisfied that it would be better to refer the Bill simpliciter to a Select Committee; and if they considered it necessary to take evidence on any particular point they could ask leave of the House to do so.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

GAME LAWS (SCOTLAND) AMENDMENT BILL.—[BILL 25.]

(Mr. M'Lagan, Sir William Stirling Maxwell, Sir Edward Colebrooke, Mr. John Maitland.)

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. M'Lagan.)

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON said, that as the present Bill did not agree with the Bill that was read a second time last Session, and as it included some amendments suggested by the Government last year, he concluded it would have their support. He thought it necessary to go somewhat in detail into the objections he entertained to the Bill. His first objection was to Clause 3. The Bill of last year was made applicable to tenants who held leases of one year's duration—yearly tenants; the present Bill was applicable only to tenants under a lease of not less than two years. The effect of the clause would be to throw out of the benefits of the Bill the small yearly tenants, the very class of people who suffered most materially from the damage done by game. Therefore, he did not think it would be fair to restrict the operation of the Bill to tenants holding under long leases only, or under leases of over two years. His next objection was to Clause 4, which dealt with the sole right of "hunting, taking, and killing rabbits, hares, and other game." The effect of the clause would be, that if the landlord reserved to himself winged game and hares—the usual reservation—he would not be able to fire a shot, either himself or his friends, at a crow, a wood-pigeon, or a rabbit during the whole period of 19 years. He asked the House whether that was a state of things which landlords were likely to accept? His next objection was to sub-section 3 of Clause 4. In this sub-section, the principle of last year's Bill was abandoned. The principle of last year's Bill was, that in order to reserve the sole right of shooting game, the amount agreed upon between the landlord and tenant that the latter was to suffer by the depredations of game must be stated in the lease, and upon that amount the landlord was to be assessed for rates and taxes; and it was pointed out that that provision would insure a just amount being inserted in the lease, because if the amount was too small the tenant would come in more readily to claim damages; and if it was high, the landlord would then have to pay taxes to that amount. The one was a counter-check upon the other. But in sub-section 3 of this Bill that principle was abandoned, and the landlord was allowed to reserve the game, or any part of it, or any part of the wild animals, without stating any sum as the amount to which he thought the tenant was likely to suffer from the depredations of game. The result would be, that the landlords would never put down any amount—because the Bill provided that where no amount was stated, 40s. should be taken as the amount of damage done, without any claim for compensation. The clause also provided that the damage must be shown to have been committed by that class of game or wild animals to which the reservation applied; that if the landlord reserved to himself winged game and hares, and gave up to the tenant the right to shoot rabbits, and to kill wood-pigeons and rooks, the tenant might demand from his landlord compensation for damage done to his crops. But the difficulty would be to prove what damage was done by the hares, which belonged to the landlord, as distinguished from the damage done by the rabbits, wood-pigeons, and crows, which belonged to the tenant. Everyone acquainted with the question knew the great difficulty of proving damage by game. The licensed valuers themselves who inspected the crops on behalf of the parties differed in some instances to such an extent, that it was difficult to believe they were speaking of the same thing—that was, as to damage done by game. Then the damage done by wood-pigeons was very great, and had greatly increased since the gun licence had been imposed upon farmers. They were unable now to destroy wood-pigeons. The consequence was that associations were formed in many parts of Scotland for the purpose of destroying the pigeons; they offered rewards for their destruction—1*d.* a-head for rooks and wood-pigeons and 6*d.* a-dozen for wood-pigeons' eggs. There was another thing which imported great difficulty into the question of assessing the amount the landlord had to pay—namely, the damage done by the tenant himself, or which occurred through his neglect or carelessness. In the case of sheep straying from the fold, for instance, or sheep breaking out of the paths, as they were called in Scotland, they would cause in one night a great amount of damage, and it would be hard that the landlord should have to pay for them. But no landlord could well prove that the damage had been occasioned by a flock of sheep straying out at night. There was another injustice which would be occasioned under this clause, which did not arise under the Bill of last year—namely, that arising from the necessity of a double proof, first, that the damage was done by the game reserved, and, next, that it was done by game which merely harboured on the land or came upon it from neighbouring land. By the Bill the landlord of one property would be liable to pay for the damage done to his tenant by game and wild animals coming from another man's property. That, he thought, was a very great hardship. Another objection was in reference to moors and grouse shooting though there were no crops on the moors. By this Bill, unless the owner of a moor reserved to himself the hares upon it, the tenant might come and shoot them although he had no crops which they could injure. That was very hard. Moreover, the Bill would be found practically inapplicable, because it would be set aside by "the regulations for shooting" in Scotland. Nearly all the proprietors in Scotland had regulations for shooting by which all tenants were bound when they took leases, and nothing in this Bill, so far as he could see, would set aside those regulations if the tenant accepted them, and unless he did accept them he could not get a farm. One of the regulations was this—

"The tenant shall have no claim if the alleged damage committed upon him shall be held to have been done by hares or rabbits or other wild animals."

A tenant subscribing to those regulations would derive no benefit from the Bill now before them. Again, take Clause 4, as he had already shown, the provisions as to assessment were futile; and, further, it seemed to him that if the landlord reserved to himself the hares and winged game the tenant would be able to rear rabbits to any extent, and sell them in the market, after which he might come upon the landlord for the damage they had done as if it had been done by hares and winged game only. The hon. Member then proceeded to criticise the succeeding proposals of the Bill with great minuteness, objecting to the provisions respecting proceedings before the Sheriff if the tenant did not obtain compensation without; to the omission of provisions respecting pasture lands, although much damage was done by rabbits and ground game to spring pastures; to the power of obtaining interdict being given to the tenant against the landlord, and was not given to the landlord against the tenant.

Coming to Clause 9, any person might be allowed by the tenant to shoot hares and rabbits without a licence. The effect of that would be very much to encourage poaching, for the poacher would only have to obtain a commission from the farmers in his neighbourhood to shoot rabbits on their account, and he could do so without obtaining a gun licence or a game certificate. That, he said, was a most objectionable state of things; but the clause was objectionable on another ground, for it contained a provision that, in point of fact, declared what was the present state of the law in Scotland. It said that from and after the passing of the Act every person should be free to destroy rabbits on his own land without a gun licence; but the fact was that the tenant occupying the land could now destroy rabbits without a licence.

MR. M'LAGAN: Not in Scotland.

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON said, he would quote the Act, as the hon. Member seemed to doubt him. In 23 & 24 Vict. c. 90, it was set forth—

"The taking or destroying of conies in Great Britain by the proprietor of any warren whatsoever, or any inclosed ground, or of any inclosed ground whatever, or by the tenant of lands, either by himself or by his direction or permission," and so on.

MR. M'LAGAN said, that applied to the game certificate and not to the gun licence.

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON said, it was so. He saw he had fallen into a mistake. However, the Bill had undergone very important changes since last year, and although there was perhaps no Member of the House better acquainted with the subject than the hon. Member, still the circumstance that his proposals had undergone such considerable alterations showed that the hon. Member himself was still in a state of great uncertainty as to the best shape in which he could bring his proposals forward. There were two other Game Bills, before the House, and he thought it would greatly facilitate the settlement of the question if Her Majesty's Government would consent to refer the three Bills to a Select Committee, with the view of seeing whether they could not present to the House a good practicable Bill that would be regarded as a permanent settlement of the question.

MR. J. W. BARCLAY said, that a great many of the points to which the

hon. Baronet opposite had objected might be discussed and settled with much greater facility in Committee than in the course of a debate on the second reading of the Bill. He himself gave a general support to the Bill and intended to vote for the second reading; but, at the same time, he must tell the House that he did not think the Bill would be a settlement of the question with which it dealt. The propositions and arguments which the hon. Baronet the Member for East Aberdeenshire had directed against the system of valuation proposed in the Bill no doubt had great force. He (Mr. Barclay) could not speak as to the experience of his hon. Friend (Mr. M'Lagan) behind him, but certainly he could say from his own that he had never heard of any farmer being disposed to accept this system of valuation as a settlement of the question, or as one which was at all likely to become so. His hon. Friend (Mr. M'Lagan) knew very well—in fact, no one knew better—that it was practically impossible to value the damage done by game with any real approximation to accuracy; but certain statements had been put forward by the hon. Baronet and others, which it might be well to refer to. Even if it were possible to assess the actual damage done to the crops by game, the payment of that damage to the tenant, even where there might be no difficulty, would not be satisfactory, because it would not indemnify nor compensate him for the loss he had suffered. Every farmer knew that a large amount of consequential damage would not be covered by the payment of a sum for direct damage or loss from the injury done to the crop by game. The whole system of a farm would be thrown out of joint by the loss of the crop. It might be laid down as a firm proposition that no farmer would enter on a system of high farming if he had cause to fear that the crops he had to spend his money in raising were likely to be damaged by game, even although he might have the assurance provided by an Act of Parliament that he would receive compensation for the direct damage. He did not propose to criticize the clauses or details of the Bill, but there was a principle involved in the 4th clause to which he wished to direct attention—that was, the question as to the sole right of taking and killing game and rabbits. Under this provision of the Bill, he understood that the landlord must either preserve game and wild animals exclusively, or he must hand them over to the tenant, to be his exclusive property. In that case the landlord, in handing over the game to the tenant, and giving him power to prevent any great increase, would at the same time be prevented from killing any himself or allowing his friends to do so. Now, so far as he understood the feeling of the farmers, it was this: They did not desire to have the possession of game or wild animals for the sake of their value—what they wished was, to have control over them for the purpose of preventing any increase of game such as to an appreciable extent would be injurious to their crops. Such being the case, they would have no objection whatever to an arrangement whereby the proprietors should share with them the privilege of shooting over their farms. He would suggest to his hon. Friend (Mr. M'Lagan) whether in Committee the Bill could not be easily modified so as to meet that objection. Another objection he had to the Bill was, that it dealt only to a limited extent with the Game Laws in their criminal aspect. In those laws at present there were certainly very many objectionable features, and it would be extremely desirable that any new Act of Parliament should deal with them. He recognized the very great importance of the principle embodied in the Bill, that Game Law cases should be dealt with by the sheriffs instead of by the justices. During the past winter there had been some extraordinary cases of oppression under the Game Laws, and, looking to the reports in the newspapers, the decisions and convictions arrived at seemed to him to have been founded on very slender and insufficient grounds. As the Bill touched on the jurisdiction of the justices, it would be more satisfactory to all parties if that jurisdiction was transferred to the sheriffs entirely. But the chief reason why he supported the Bill was, that it asserted the principle of the right of Parliament to interfere in contracts between landlord and tenant, and said that the landlord should no longer have the right of dictating such terms to the tenant as he might think fit, or saying that whatever damage he might sustain he should receive no compensation. It would be a great gain

to have the principle clearly laid down, that if a landlord was to preserve game, he should at least specify the amount of damage which the tenant might be called on to suffer before he had the right to claim compensation. With reference to what fell from the hon. Baronet the Member for East Aberdeenshire he understood the Bill would override the private contracts and, so far as it went, supersede those rules and regulations to which the hon. Member referred. On these grounds principally he supported the second reading of the Bill. He did not believe it would settle the question finally—but he thought the operation of such an Act would do very considerable service indirectly—just as the amount of discussion and agitation which had taken place on the Game Laws of late years had done much to diminish the excessive preservation of game which formerly took place in many parts of the country. The provisions of the Bill, if they became law, would probably have an indirect effect in causing a considerable improvement in the present state of affairs; although he had no doubt that exceptional landlords would still be found who would cause much disturbance and heartburning and bad feeling, as they did at present. He thought it would be far better to pass a comprehensive law based on this principle—namely, that the preservation of hares and rabbits by tenants at their own expense for the benefit of their landlords was an arrangement of so indefinite a nature as not to possess the true elements of a contract, and that, therefore, Parliament would refuse to recognize such an arrangement at all. For the reasons he had stated, believing the Bill would do a certain amount of good, he would support it.

COLONEL ALEXANDER said, that some years ago he was under the painful necessity of initiating the opposition to the measure of his hon. Friend the Member for Linlithgowshire, and therefore he had additional pleasure, on this occasion, in offering him his humble support. They ought to feel grateful to him, not only for the care he had bestowed in endeavouring to find a panacea for this evil, and a solution of this thorny and complex question, but also for consenting generously to abandon some of his most cherished convictions in order to contrive a compromise to reconcile opposing and conflicting interests. He (Colonel Alexander) trusted that all hon. Members on either side would meet the hon. Gentleman in the same spirit, and that they would cheerfully abandon any of their own pet crotchets and inventions, and heartily co-operate with him in endeavouring to meet and grapple with the difficulties of this, to Scotland at least, most important and momentous question. Not that he was sanguine enough to believe that this Bill would satisfy the whole of Scotland. No doubt there were some extreme politicians who said they would not be content unless what they called the inalienable right to the game on their land was conceded to them. A gentleman, who was the leader of the party in the county which he had the honour to represent (Ayrshire), recently wrote to say that he perfectly agreed with him that all the measures proposed as a remedy for the evils of the Game Laws up to the present were shams; and he added that the proposal which he (Colonel Alexander) supported at the time was, perhaps, the greatest sham of the whole—that being the proposal supported by the noble Lord the Member for Elginshire (Viscount Macduff) for the concurrent right of landlord and tenant to the ground game. The gentleman he alluded to said he was perfectly content to wait patiently for what was the only true remedy—namely, the result of the ballot-boxes at the next Election. That statement probably would hardly be satisfactory to the noble Lord the Member for Elginshire. The noble Lord said on that occasion that if that—concurrent endowment of landlord and tenant—was done, higher questions than hares and rabbits would take their place in Scotch county elections, and that that miserable bone of contention would be for ever buried. The noble Lord was young and sanguine, but if he expected all agitation on the Game Laws to cease, he would be like the countryman who waited for all the water in the river to flow past. But because they could not please everybody, were they not to attempt to please anybody? He thought this measure was calculated to please all those who would rather have half a loaf than no bread. As to what was called “the inalienable right” of the tenant to the game on his land, he was sure Parliament would never listen to or sanction such an immoral proposal. No good tenant in Scotland—and almost all were good tenants—would take advantage of such a measure—the only people to profit by it would be a small class of men—men to be found in every community—who were totally unable to realize the pride felt by an honest man who felt that his word was as good as his bond. It had been said that this Bill interfered with freedom of contract; and the hon. Member for Forfarshire (Mr. Barclay) based his support of it on that ground. He (Colonel Alexander) did not possess the microscopic vision of the hon. Member for Forfarshire, and he was quite unable to see in what way the Bill interfered with freedom of contract. The noble Lord the Member for Haddingtonshire (Lord Elcho) said last year in his speech on the Bill that free Englishmen should not be interfered with in their bargains by the State, but that they would be so interfered with under the provisions of that Bill. Now, if this Bill should become law, all that the State would say to individuals was—"You are at perfect liberty to make any contract you please; we do not interfere with you, but we require you to state your agreement in such precise and unmistakeable terms that we shall be able to bind both parties to the fulfilment of the agreement." The State did not interfere with the contract; it only enforced it after it had been made. Some hon. Members were not aware that in Scotland, although not in England, the tenant was even now empowered to claim compensation for any damage done by excess or super-abundance of game on his land. All that this Bill did was to afford a cheaper and more expeditious mode of obtaining compensation than existed at present. He could not for the life of him see how this Bill interfered with freedom of contract. What were the alternative proposals? He had already dealt with the subject-matter of the inalienable right; but even if that were conceded, what was to protect the land of the non-sporting man from the ravages of the game committed on the land of his sporting neighbour? Such a concession as the so-called inalienable right would not only be immoral; it would also be useless. Then there was a proposal to exclude hares and rabbits entirely from the game list. That was a proposal conceived principally in the interests of the poacher, who would be free to ramble at his will and pleasure over the land, confident that any damage he might have to pay under the Trespass Act would be more than re-imbursed by the game he could appropriate. The Committee which sat three years ago under the presidency of the First Lord of the Admiralty fairly stated the difficulty of making game property. They said—

"It would be difficult to confer on game all the attributes of property, and it would be unreasonable to include in the category of property animals which, by their own act, can transfer themselves to the property of others."

There remained, then, the proposal of concurrent right, which he (Colonel Alexander) was at one time disposed to support; but he now thought there was one fatal objection to it—that there would be great facility for evasion. In any case, he did not think that plan could compete with that proposed by his hon. Friend. In regard to the transfer of jurisdiction, he was assured that the grievance felt on this head was inappreciable; but as a good deal of feeling had been aroused on the matter, he would agree to abandon that jurisdiction, which the great majority of the magistrates did not desire to retain. He did not entertain any apprehension that the magistrates would feel themselves placed in an inferior position to their English brethren on account of parting with this portion of their jurisdiction. In regard to cumulative penalties, it was proved before the Committee to which the hon. Member for Forfarshire (Mr. Barclay) alluded, that they had been rarely exacted. Therefore, there was no necessity for retaining them on the Statute Book. Moreover, the magistrates were apt to show undue leniency if they felt that the prosecution was likely to be carried further, and cumulative penalties demanded. It had been said that at present any landlord could give compensation for damage done by game; and he concurred in that remark, for he knew that in many leases clauses were inserted entitling the tenant to reasonable compensation for damage done by game; but then the question arose—What was reasonable? They all knew that what appeared reasonable to one man was not so to another. The Bill of the hon. Member proposed a simple and efficacious remedy for what had been hitherto doubtful. This measure had been now before the House and the country for 12 months; its provisions had been well discussed, and he thought they had for the most part met the approval of Scotland. He hoped the Government would, after pointing out any amendments they thought desirable, assent to the second reading of the Bill, and he trusted that hon. Members from England and Ireland would remember one statement made by the Committee of 1873—namely, “That they found in Scotland a much stronger feeling had been evoked in regard to the preservation of game than in England.” He trusted, therefore, that the House would no longer trifle with this important question.

MR. GRANT DUFF said, he should support the second reading of the Bill; but he did not rise to make any general remarks upon its provisions, for he saw that it was likely to obtain considerable support from both sides of the House. He rose simply to bear testimony to a simple fact—to the fact, namely, that the speech of the noble Lord the Member for Elginshire (Viscount Macduff), of last year, to which the hon. and gallant Member who had just sat down (Colonel Alexander) took exception, exactly represented the views held by the great majority of the Liberals in the three north-eastern counties of Scotland, and, he believed, the views of a large portion of the Conservative country population of those same counties.

MR. RAMSAY said, that in his opinion the principles embodied in the Bill were well calculated to provide a practical remedy for an admitted hardship which occurred under the existing law. That hardship arose from the circumstance that, under the existing common law of Scotland, a tenant was entitled to compensation for any damage done by game, should the game have been increased during the currency of his lease beyond the point at which it stood when he entered upon his lease. But hon. Members would readily understand the difficulty which must occur in proving that an increase had taken place. A large amount of the irritation and heart-burning which had arisen in Scotland with reference to the Game Laws, as a whole, was due to the circumstance that when a tenant came into court and sued his landlord for damage done by game upon his land, he was met by the insuperable difficulty of proving that the damage done at the time when he brought his action had increased beyond the amount of damage done at the period of his entrance upon his farm. Now, the Bill did provide a remedy for that defect in the administration of our existing law. It provided that the amount of damage done by game at the date of the tenant's entrance on the land should be specified in the lease, and if it should be determined that a greater amount of damage had been done by game than that which was specified, he should be entitled to receive the difference from his landlord. It was on that account that he valued this Bill very highly. With reference to the other principle adopted in this Bill—namely, the transfer from the Justices of the Peace of jurisdiction in respect of offences against the Game Laws—he concurred with the hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for South Ayrshire (Colonel Alexander) when he said that the majority of the Justices of the Peace in Scotland were quite willing to be relieved of that part of their duties. He could see nothing derogatory to them in the proposal that this jurisdiction should be transferred. Much of the criticism which had been passed by the hon. Baronet opposite (Sir Alexander Gordon) upon this measure could be satisfactorily met in Committee. He heard the hon. Member for Forfarshire (Mr. Barclay) with some surprise state that his reason for supporting the Bill was that it did interfere with freedom of contract. He (Mr. Ramsay) regretted to hear the expression of such a sentiment in that House. He should be very loath to support any Bill which aimed at placing the farmers of Scotland under a system of tutelage, under which they would have done for them by law that which they were quite competent and willing to do for themselves. But he had other objections to the Bill, which would be better stated in Committee. In particular he agreed with the hon. Baronet opposite, the Member for East Aberdeenshire, in objecting to the proposal to apply a different law to the tenant from that which was applied to the landlord. Why should the landlord be denuded of any legal remedy for the enforcement of a contract into which a tenant voluntarily entered, while the latter was to have full liberty to apply such a remedy as against his landlord? He thought anything more unfair could hardly be proposed; and if no other hon. Member should take exception to that provision, he would move in Committee that the 8th clause be omitted from the Bill. There were other points upon which he might dwell; but as they would have ample opportunity in Committee to discuss the details of the measure, he would not occupy the time of the House further than to say that he should give his cordial support to the second reading.

MR. MARK STEWART said, that he ventured to differ from some hon. Members opposite, and also from his hon. Friend behind (Sir Alexander Gordon) with regard to the course Her Majesty's Government would adopt on this Bill. Although we had had until now but one speaker from behind the Ministerial benches, and he had spoken in a spirit hostile to the principle of the Bill, he could not help thinking that the Government, taking into consideration all the measures which had been so frequently discussed in this House and the counties with regard to the question of the Game Laws in Scotland, and seeing nothing had been yet done, would support the second reading of the Bill. It could not be denied for one moment that this Game question occupied a very prominent place in all political addresses of hon. Members in Scotland; yet, although this Parliament had been sitting now for more than three years, no attempt on the part of the Government had been made to pass any measure which could be said to afford any amount of relief at all to the tenant-farmers of Scotland in this matter, and this consideration ought to induce the House to interpose in favour of this Bill at this moment. It would be a matter of satisfaction, at least to the farmers of the North, where high rents had to be paid, and a large labour bill and vast outlay had to be incurred, if the House of Commons at the present moment were prepared to legislate finally on the question. All who had any knowledge of agriculture knew perfectly well that unless the crops were reasonably protected from the ravages of hares and rabbits and other game, the tenants could not reap the benefit of the large capital which they put into the land. If that protection were given, it would give not only gratification to them, but would show to Scotland that the pledges given by Scotch Members with regard to this question were not allowed to remain unfulfilled. His hon. Friend the Member for Aberdeenshire talked of the Bill as if it only applied to his own particular county. Of course, he (Mr. M. Stewart) could not be as cognizant as his hon. Friend was of the state of that county, but he knew that the Bill would very much assist many counties in the Southern parts of Scotland, and would give more satisfaction than other Bills introduced into that House. The hon. Member for Forfarshire (Mr. Barclay) had made a speech in which, while he supported the principle of the Bill, he disclosed a strong predilection in favour of his own pet measure—of which, however, no Notice appeared to have been given for the present Session. All knew that the feeling of the House in past Sessions was antagonistic to the principles of the hon. Member's measure; they also knew that it would be impossible to bring forward at the present time a Bill proposing to interfere with freedom of contract with any chance of passing. Therefore, he did not think that they would hear very much more of the Bill of the hon. Member for Forfarshire, or of measures of that character. But here they had a Bill which he maintained did not interfere with freedom of contract. He need not repeat the argument which had been so well stated by the hon. and gallant Member for South Ayrshire (Colonel Alexander). He thought it quite clear that if contracts were entered into by two parties, all that Parliament could do was to see that they were reasonably carried out; and that was all that was proposed in this Bill. The hon. Baronet the Member for East Aberdeenshire (Sir Alexander Gordon) had pointed out many objections that arose to the working of the Bill. He told them they would not be able to distinguish between damage done by hares and rabbits, and that occasioned by sheep. He (Mr. M. Stewart) knew no practical farmer in or out of the House who would tell them he had any difficulty in distinguishing the teeth marks of the animals which had bitten a turnip. Then his hon. Friend took exception to the proviso that notice should be given within three weeks.

Mr. Ramsay

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON: Will you allow me to say that damage done by game is within three weeks, the damage done by sheep and their feet marks may be six months.

MR. MARK STEWART said, he said teeth marks, not sheep marks. He understood his hon. Friend that he had great objections to that term of three weeks—he seemed to argue it was more than three weeks, and his first argument went to prove that. Now, within three weeks might mean the very next day after the damage had been committed; it did not necessarily follow that it was up to the time of the expiry of those three weeks. Then, again, his hon. Friend said that the Bill did not touch the Game regulations of that part of the county with which he was connected. Well, if it did not, why take so much exception to it, and why find so much fault? He (Mr. M. Stewart) could again tell him it favourably affected many other parts of Scotland. Among other instances, he objected to that clause which prevented proceedings being taken against a tenant by interdict. That was a question which would have to be more fully discussed. He (Mr. M. Stewart) thought there was a great deal to be said on both sides of the question. It was at times a very great hardship to proceed against a respectable young tenant-farmer, whose only fault was that he had amused himself beyond the verge of prudence; but, on the other hand, there were many who did not care for a small fine which would be imposed by civil action, and therefore who would practically escape the law altogether. There was only one more point to which he (Mr. M. Stewart) wished to draw the attention of the House, and that was with regard to the feeling of the magistrates on the subject of any transfer of their jurisdiction. As far as his experience of magistrates went, he could not believe that there was that strong emotional feeling which was described last year from the front bench against the taking away the power and authority of magistrates. He did not think that among the Scotch magistrates at least—who had very much less magisterial work than those of England, and who very seldom met in quarter sessions or petty session—he could name one who would in the slightest degree feel aggrieved if this jurisdiction, often invidious and disagreeable, were taken away from him, or who would consider he was having any portion of the dignity of his office removed. He had much pleasure in supporting the hon. Member for Linlithgowshire (Mr. M'Lagan) in his endeavour to pass this Bill into law, and thanked his hon. Friend for introducing it.

COLONEL MURE said, he entirely concurred in the expression which fell from the hon. and gallant Member for South Ayrshire (Colonel Alexander) when he said that he thought the hon. Member for Linlithgowshire had grappled with the subject in such a manner as to afford a fair prospect of its being brought to a satisfactory conclusion. The Scotch Members were greatly indebted to the hon. Member for his persevering efforts. There was one remark which fell from the hon. Member for Forfarshire (Mr. Barclay) with which he could not agree. The hon. Member said he felt gratification in finding that Parliament was invited to step in to interfere with the freedom of contract. Now, if there was one thing which he disliked in the Bill it was that it had been thought necessary that Parliament should step in to interfere with the right of contract. The whole difficulty, however, in connection with the Game question in Scotland had undoubtedly been that of defining what the damage was. He thought, on the whole, that the landlords of Scotland were reasonable, and that, on the whole, the tenants were reasonable; but when the matter of contract was brought before them the great difficulty had always been to define the amount of damage; and that was a point which the hon. Member for Linlithgowshire had successfully grappled with in his Bill. For that reason, he was disposed to waive his dislike to the indirect interference with the freedom of contract which undoubtedly was to be found in the measure. One good feature of the Bill was that it assimilated the law of Scotland to the law of England. In Scotland, tenants had always pointed it out as a grievance that the prior right to the game did not belong to them, whereas in England the tenants had that right. That had always been a grievance with the Scotch farmers. But if there was one provision of the Bill more valuable than another, it was the transfer of the jurisdiction in Game

Law cases from the magistrate to the sheriff. No persons could desire to do their duty more impartially than the magistrates of Scotland, but most of them were proprietors of land, and probably game preservers; and when a game question came before them, no matter how strong their desire might be to act impartially, they formed a tribunal to a certain extent tainted. They were interested in one view, and the tenant was interested in another. One point to which he desired to direct attention was the question of crops. The Bill applied to growing crops only, but in a large part of Scotland the growing crop was grass. The Scotch—at least in that district from which he came—were now competing with Gloucester and Cheshire farmers. The cheese-making in Wigtownshire and Ayrshire was one of the great industries in Scotland, and any practical farmer here would agree with him that nothing could be more grievous or disheartening to the tenants of Wigtownshire and Ayrshire, who had entered into competition with the great cheese-making counties in England, than to find themselves thwarted in the competition by the injury to their crops which all kinds of game—hares particularly—unquestionably did in some Scotch districts. In this view it was even more important that the Bill should apply to growing grass than to the crops to which it referred. Another reason why he approved this Bill was that it set aside entirely the idea that hares were to be removed out of the protection of the Game Laws. Nothing in his mind would be more injurious to the tenant. In the populous part of Scotland where he lived, he had no hesitation in saying that a proposal of so sweeping a nature would be far from satisfactory to farmers as well as to landlords. The agitation about game in Scotland was not now nearly so great as it used to be. The reason was that the discussion on the subject, and the growing common-sense of the landlords and tenants had resulted in their taking a far more reasonable view of the Game question than they did some years ago. He remembered, when discussing the policy of the different Game Bills before Parliament previous to the General Election, when the Game question formed one staple of political discussion—which was perhaps one of the worst features of the unsettled condition of this question—several tenant-farmers implored him not to persist in a design he had formed of removing a game-keeper from his property; for they said—"If you move him we shall have our farms swept by poachers, our gates and fences destroyed, and we shall have no protection whatever for our property." That was a fair illustration of the point he wished to impress on the House—namely, that farmers, while attaching great importance to protection from the ravages of hares and rabbits, also attached great importance to the protection afforded them by the Game Laws. There were points in this measure, no doubt, which could be amended in Committee—in particular he recommended for consideration the point with regard to grass crops—but he must again congratulate the hon. Member on having brought in his Bill, and hoped it would pass the second reading.

LORD ELCHO said, he agreed that it was desirable that this game question should be settled, for it was a source of heartburning to Scotland. The hon. Member for the Falkirk Burghs (Mr. Ramsay) entirely expressed his (Lord Elcho's) own opinion when he said it was not wise to do for men what they could do for themselves. That was sound policy which should guide legislation on this subject. In regard to any general legislation upon it, he thought it would be better left in the hands of the Government than in those of private Members. There was a mass of information in the Blue Books at the disposal of the Government, and if they would turn their hands to it they would elaborate from that a useful measure. He did not intend on this occasion to oppose the second reading of the Bill. Last year he thought it his duty to oppose it, and indeed he was asked to move its rejection on account of its interference with contract. Some said that it did still, and some said that it did not, interfere with freedom of contract. The same thing was said last year. To night they had had a very eloquent speech from his hon. and gallant Friend behind him the Member for South Ayrshire (Colonel Alexander). When he found Gentlemen whose views on this question of interference with contract were diametrically opposed to his own, supporting the Bill on the very ground that it did interfere with freedom of contract, he thought there was ipso facto good ground that the enemy was in the right, and that this unsound policy did exist in the Bill. The hon. Member for Forfarshire (Mr. Barclay) held the same language this year as he did last year upon this question of contract. The hon. Member for Forfarshire supported the Bill on the very ground that it did interfere with freedom of contract, though he thought it did not interfere enough. The hon. and gallant Member for East Aberdeenshire (Sir Alexander Gordon) supported the Bill last year on the ground that it did interfere; but he thought that this year the interference was not so great, and therefore he did not like it now. But the hon. Member opposite (Mr. Barclay) thought it still an interference with contract, and that was why he supported the Bill this year, in full confidence that, when under not a "traditional," but some other sort of House of Commons, he would be able to push his principle to greater lengths. He (Lord Elcho) was bound to do this justice to his hon. Friend opposite the Member for West Lothian (Mr. M'Lagan), and to say that last year's Bill was evidently more clearly an interference with freedom of contract than this year's. The Government last year felt it to be so, and they put down words which, in their opinion, guarded this freedom of contract; and these words his hon. Friend had adopted. He (Lord Elcho) felt that till they heard the explanation of the Government as to how far they thought the words they put down last year did or did not protect them from that interference with contract, it would be impertinent on his part to maintain that it had not given that protection. The Government had been placed in their present position mainly because the country trusted to them to maintain the security of property and the freedom of making contract between man and man. That was the principle they had upheld in the Agricultural Holdings Act, and the House had a right to expect from them that they would allow no legislation to pass which infringed the principle of liberty for sane full-grown men to make their bargains with each other. In the confidence that the Government would be careful to guard against this interference, he would accede to the second reading of the Bill.

VISCOUNT MACDUFF was understood to say that he had not had the good fortune to hear the remarks of the hon. and gallant Member for South Ayrshire, but he understood that he had taken exception to something which he (Viscount Macduff) had said last year when this Bill was under discussion. He rose, therefore, to say that he adhered to everyone of the opinions he then submitted to the House. He added that he was certain that this question would never be settled by any Bill which was not drawn up on the lines of the one which had been introduced into the House by the hon. and gallant Member for East Aberdeenshire.

THE LORD ADVOCATE: It is not the intention of Her Majesty's Government to offer any opposition to the second reading of the Bill which has been introduced by the hon. Member for Linlithgow. But in consequence of some observations that have been made in the course of this discussion, and in consequence of what has fallen from the noble Lord the Member for East Lothian (Lord Elcho), it is absolutely necessary that I should say something with regard to the position we occupy in relation to this Bill. It has been said that all the Amendments of which Notice was given by my Predecessor in office last year have been given effect to in the present Bill. That is so far the case; but I must call the attention of the House to the fact that these Amendments, of which Notice was given by the late Lord Advocate, did not constitute the whole of the objections which the Government had to urge against the measure. On the contrary, there were other objections stated by private Members against certain clauses of the Bill of very great importance, to which the objections then stated by the Lord Advocate were simply supplementary. I do not intend to go into details which may be discussed in Committee; but I think it is due to the hon. Member who has introduced this Bill to inform him fairly of the points which we conceive are still open to re-consideration, and which I now recommend to his consideration before this Bill passes on to a further stage. It appears to me that this Bill does not interfere in any proper sense of the expression with the freedom of contract. It makes—and this appears to me to be the leading principle of the Bill—what seem to me very fair and reasonable provisions for ascertaining the damage done by game as between landlord and tenant. That is a duty which is thrown upon the Courts of Law in Scotland, and I think the Legislature are quite entitled to require that in this matter the law shall be placed on such a footing that Courts of Law shall be able to deal equitably and fairly with these questions as they arise. Now, I venture to doubt whether at present the state of the law in Scotland is such as to admit of that fair and equitable treatment of these questions when they do arise, for under long leases of 19 years—which is the general duration of leases in arable and agricultural subjects—where there is no special stipulation for regulating game damages, the implied condition is that the tenant shall submit, without having the right to claim damages, to as much injury as could be inflicted upon his crops by the average stock of game upon his farm at the time when he entered upon his lease. And accordingly, about the 15th or 16th year of the currency of the lease, when the period of its duration has nearly expired, and a Court of Law is called upon to estimate damage due to the tenant, it may be quite a simple thing to estimate the loss occasioned by injury from game during the year in which the claim is made. But that is not the measure of the tenant's right. In order to obtain the measure of the tenant's right, you have to dispose of two very speculative questions—first, what the average amount of game was upon the farm 15 years before; and when you have ascertained that factor, you have in the second place to estimate how much that average stock would have eaten had it been upon the farm during the year for which the claim is made. And that which the present Bill appears to me, in its leading principle, to provide, is this, that after ascertaining the total damage done in the year for which damage is claimed, the parties themselves shall furnish the Court with a fair contract measure, in money value, of the amount of damage to which it is stipulated that the tenant shall submit, instead of leaving that amount a matter of implication and speculation. Accordingly, the Bill provides that it must be arranged by contract between the contracting parties what shall be the factor that is to be deducted from the actual damage done to the crop. That is not taking from the parties the liberty of contract. The Bill merely compels the parties who seek a remedy to settle in their contract what that remedy shall be. But there are some points in this Bill upon which objections were stated last year, and to these I shall very briefly advert, because it appears to me that as yet the Bill does not satisfactorily dispose of them. In the beginning of the 4th clause the words of the Bill apply to all land, whether arable, or grass, or stone, or heather, or moss, or whatever the composition of the farm may be. But when you come to the clauses regulating damages, the expressions used are limited to cereal crops and green crops. It appears to me to be a proper matter for consideration how far the scope of this Bill should be extended to all land, or whether you are to assimilate a deer forest or mere grouse land having heather upon it, to a farm where there are crops of various kinds, including grass, not being mere natural vegetation, but the results produced by capital, skill, and mechanical appliances. There are various other matters introduced into in this Bill which did not appear in the last. For instance—"wild birds," and also "wild animals." I am quite aware that there are wild animals which are very nearly allied to game, but these deer and roedeer it would be easy to name in a Bill like this. Still the words "wild birds" and "wild animals" are very wide. If I may say so, they cover everything from a wood pigeon to a sparrow, and from a roedeer to a rat. I can hardly think that this was seriously intended by the framer of the Bill. I would further suggest that the very introduction of wild birds is objectionable; and I think crows, sparrows, and so forth, ought to be omitted from the Bill altogether, for reasons which have already been stated in the course of this discussion. If these are to be retained, I fear that by this Bill—which in some respects is to my mind a very useful Bill—we shall only relieve our Judges from one onerous duty in order to impose upon them another still more difficult. Let me call the attention of the House to clause 5 of the Bill. The tenant is to give notice if he is of opinion that damage has been done to his crops by game, "wild birds, and wild animals harboured on the lands of the lessor in any one year during the lease." It might be difficult to tell how many head of game were on a farm 10 or 15 years before; but the duty that would be laid on a Judge who has to decide this matter, if he decides according to the letter of this clause, will be that of discovering out of a given number of crows or pigeons which destroyed the tenant's crops, how many and what proportion were harboured on the lands of the lessor, and how many on the lands of his neighbours. I would suggest to my hon. Friend that the Government cannot in Committee support any proposal of that kind. In regard to the mode of carrying out the provisions of the Bill, I appreciate the importance of a simple remedy, and shall be prepared to give my hon. Friend any assistance I can in devising means for attaining this desirable result. As to making the Sheriff's judgment depend on the valuation of one valuator, I know the difficulty of getting valuers who do not look at the question either from one side or the other, and I submit that the proposal requires re-consideration. We have been told by the hon. and gallant Member for East Aberdeenshire that in some cases which have occurred—and this statement was assented to by my hon. and gallant Friend opposite the Member for Kincardineshire—the Sheriff found difficulty in deciding game damages, because the valuers took such opposite views that he did not think they were speaking of the same case. It would be unsatisfactory to have valuers appointed who were in the habit of valuing solely for landlords; and, on the other hand it would be equally objectionable to have the assistance of valuers who were in the habit of valuing solely for tenants. I think it would be well to give the Judge discretion as to whom he should call in aid. The only other clause on which I will make a remark is the 8th, which appears to me to take away from the landlord the only remedy which can be in the least degree effectual to him for enforcing the contract. It is impossible to assimilate the remedies given to the lessor and the lessee, because the claim of the tenant for damages has no resemblance to the lessor's reserved right to game, and he therefore can have no corresponding means of enforcing it. And I would venture to suggest that where, in terms of this Bill, a lessor reserves his right to game, it may be, and in many cases will be, for the purpose of enjoying personally the sports of the field. Well, if he does so, I venture to think that is not a reserved interest which is estimable in money, or that the Sheriff can tell how much pecuniary damage the proprietor who lost his season's shooting through the lessee's breach of contract, suffered from having to remain in his own house, or from having to travel on the Continent. I wish to consider whether, in a Bill like this, which sanctions a contract by which a landlord is to retain the sole and exclusive right, upon certain conditions in the Bill specified, of shooting his own game on his own property, it is right and proper in the same breath to take away from him the only remedy which can possibly ensure his enjoyment of the right. In conclusion, I have to call the attention of the hon. Member (Mr. M'Lagan) to the important amendments touching the Inland Revenue Laws suggested by my Predecessor, but which have not been given effect to by this Bill. One relates to the gun licence. If the opposition intimated last year to the proposed partial repeal of the gun tax were successful, it appears to me that there would be no necessity for Clauses 9 and 10 of this Bill; for my hon. Friend must be aware that under the Act 11 and 12 Vict., c. 30, it is not necessary for any person in Scotland having a right to kill hares to take out a game certificate; and, that if he exercise that right in his own person, or by means of any other person having a written authority from him, he does not incur any legal liability. These are all the observations which occur to me at present. I have thought it right to state them more at large than I otherwise should have done, to prevent misconception as to the terms on which the Government have intimated their position in regard to the second reading of this Bill.

MR. M'LAGAN, in reply, said, he could not but think that his hon. and gallant Friend the Member for South Aberdeenshire (Sir Alexander Gordon) in criticizing the Bill had been somewhat hypercritical. He denied that the present Bill would in any way interfere with liberty of contract. The Bill would not interfere with liberty of contract, because the landlord would be allowed to reserve the game or to do as he thought proper; if, however, he did not insert a clause to that effect in the lease, the common law would take its course. Of course, he should be happy to consider any Amendments in Committee.

REGISTRATION OF BOROUGH VOTERS

(Sir Charles Dilke, Mr. Rathbone, Mr. Boord.)

Order for Second Reading read.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE, in moving that the Bill be now read a second time, after referring in detail to former similar Bills, said, the principle of the measure was the assimilation of the Parliamentary and municipal registers as far as the preparation of the first list and the revision were concerned. In the operation of the existing law of registration of voters great injustice was frequently done to persons who were entitled to have their names entered in the register. This was not the only Bill before the House which dealt with the subject of registration. The hon. and learned Member for Cambridge (Mr. Marten) and the hon. Member for Greenwich (Mr. Boord) had both Bills of their own, and he had hoped that the three Bills would have been allowed to pass a second reading, that they would then be referred to a Select Committee, and that next year the Government might take the subject up and deal with it themselves. He had been informed, however, that the Government intended to oppose the Bill, their opposition being founded, not upon the general principle of the measure, but upon certain clauses contained in it, the Government holding that it was not a Registration Bill, but a Reform Bill, because it touched the qualification of voters. He maintained, however, that it dealt with qualification only in a very small way. He begged to move the second reading of the Bill, and trusted the House would assent to the proposal.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Sir Charles W. Dilke.)

Mr. M'Lagan

MR. GORST said, he considered it his duty to oppose the second reading of the Bill. He could not see any practical good to be derived from the annual introduction of these Bills, which did not attempt to consolidate the law of registration, but touched only isolated portions of the law. The subject was one which might be far more appropriately dealt with by the Government. The Bill, notwithstanding the hon. Baronet's disclaimer, was a Reform Bill in disguise, and as such he must regard it. When the time came, as come it would, that it might be necessary to deal with the Parliamentary and municipal registration of voters, the party to take the matter up and introduce a Bill to deal with the franchise in such a manner as might appear to require reform was the Government. The hon. Baronet, in dealing with the lodger franchise, said his object was that every lodger who paid rent should be entitled to a vote; but if that were admitted the Parliamentary and municipal franchises would be swamped with lodgers paying a very small rent.

And it being a quarter of an hour before Six of the clock, the debate stood adjourned till To-morrow.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Thursday, 22nd February, 1877.

PERSONAL EXPLANATIONS.

THE EARL OF ROSEBURY: I rise to put a Question to the noble Earl at the head of the Government, of which I have given him private Notice. In the debate of Tuesday night the noble Earl said:—

“Now, I wish to give to the House the most striking illustration of the complete ignorance that pervaded not England alone, but the whole world, the whole of Europe, and especially those countries nearest to the spot where those atrocities were committed, and whose border populations were, above all others, most deeply interested in the matter. When the three Imperial Powers met to compose the Berlin Memorandum they composed it with an aggravation of all their charges against the Porte, which was a very natural and diplomatic course to adopt, and pointed in succession to every circumstance ad invidiam that had occurred since the publication and failure of the Andrassy Note; and yet, although Germany, Austria, and Russia were the Powers that concocted that celebrated State paper, not a single allusion is made in it to the Bulgarian atrocities, notwithstanding all of them had been perpetrated a fortnight or three weeks before it was drawn up.”

Now, my Lords, since the debate I have referred to the Blue Book, and I find that the Berlin Memorandum was communicated to the Representatives of the Six Powers on the 13th of May, and from the report of Vice Consul Dupuis and other documents it appears that at Batak on May 9—that is, four days previous—there was a wholesale massacre of about 5,000 persons; at Perushtitza on May 13, of 750; and at Boyadjikeui, on May 24, of 149. It is not, indeed, necessary to mention the various dates at which massacres were committed after the 13th of May. I think I have stated enough to convince the House and the noble Earl that there are some inconsistencies, real or apparent, between the facts as they appear in the Blue Book and the statement made by him on Tuesday night. I, therefore, beg to ask the noble Earl whether those inconsistencies are real or only apparent?

THE EARL OF BEACONSFIELD: I have received from the noble Earl opposite (Earl Granville) an intimation of his intention to make an inquiry, connected with the inquiry of the noble Earl, and I shall be able to answer both inquiries at the same time.

EARL GRANVILLE: In that case, with the noble Earl's permission, I should prefer to put my Question before he answers it. The noble Earl in the debate said—

“But the truth is this, we have heard something in these debates about Consular agents, and the information that could be obtained by their means; but the truth is this, that these atrocities were perpetrated in parts of Turkey which are almost denuded of Consular supervision, there being no commercial demands for such agencies, and the Government of a past day—I will not inquire what were their politics, representing a commercial country—having cut off all Consular agencies in that part of the Turkish Empire.”

That is the report of The Times, and it concurs with my recollection of the words used by the noble Earl. As the statement twice said to be the truth of the matter did not coincide with my recollection of a transaction with which I had something to do, I asked the noble Earl whether he could state the names of the places from which Consular supervision had been removed. This the noble Earl was unable to do at the moment, but with his usual courtesy promised the information; and added that he did not blame the action of the Government, which had its origin in the House of Commons. In this he was perfectly right; but my recollection does not further coincide with his. In consequence of a Resolution of a Committee of the House of Commons on the Consular Service Lord Clarendon decided to have an inquiry on the spot. This decision I carried out, and Mr. Kennedy, a most competent person, was sent specially to Turkey. He found that an alteration had been made by the Government with regard to the Vilayet system, and that large districts were placed under one Governor, and that these Governors were apt to play one Consul against another; and he therefore recommended a system by which a Consul should reside at the seat of Government with Vice Consuls under him. I concurred generally in these recommendations; and the result was, as regards Turkey, one Consulate was abolished at Janina in Albania, leaving only a Consular Agent there; the Consulate at Monastir, in Macedonia, was reduced in rank and emoluments; and at Varna the emoluments of a Vice Consulate were diminished. In the four remaining cases of changes in Consular establishments in European Turkey, the emoluments were, in different degrees, in each case increased. I am not aware of any action at all in respect of any Consular establishment in that part of European Turkey where the atrocities were committed. I may mention that the Foreign Office was pressed from outside to abolish the Consulship at Adrianople—to which I could not consent, conceiving it would not be for the public advantage. The Estimates carrying out these changes were prepared by the late Government, but they were examined, adopted, and presented to Parliament by the noble Earl's Administration. I therefore take the liberty of asking the noble Earl again which were the places in that portion of Turkey in which the atrocities were committed from which Consular supervision had been taken away?

THE EARL OF BEACONSFIELD: With reference to the Questions that have been addressed to me by the two noble Earls, noble Lords will remember—if they can remember the observations I addressed to the House on that occasion—that the observations I made on the points respecting which these Questions have been addressed to me were casual remarks, that there was nothing in the Motion of the noble Duke, nothing in the speech which he then delivered, and nothing which occurred in the course of the debate itself, which could have led me to believe that the lamentable incidents which have occurred in Bulgaria or any information which had been received by the Government in reference to those incidents would be made the subject of question in that debate. What happened was this. Before the Leader of the Opposition spoke, a noble Earl, who approved the action of Her Majesty's Government generally in the transactions the subject of the discussion, severely impugned the conduct of the Government in regard to the Bulgarian atrocities, and stated that the agitation which had been excited in the autumn when those atrocities became known had been caused by the Government not having imparted to Parliament and the public the information they had received. My Lords, you must feel that was a very grave accusation to make, and it was impossible for me—although directing my argument to the subject which had been brought under our consideration with great ability by the noble Duke—not to advert to those observations of the noble Earl. Had I been in the least aware that the incidents in Bulgaria and the conduct of the Government in reference to the atrocities would be called in question, I should, of course, have refreshed my memory before entering on the debate by a reference to the Papers on those points; I should have made no statements respecting the Consular Service, or anything else, without having the documents at hand to bear me out. But that was not the position of affairs. The matter was introduced most unexpectedly and suddenly. It was one which I could not have anticipated to find brought forward, and I could speak only from my general knowledge of affairs. I think the principle on which a Minister should answer Questions addressed to him in Parliament is a clear one. He is bound to give Parliament the fullest information in his possession, provided that it is not confidential information or that its communication would not be detrimental to the interests of the State. But authentic information must be information received from responsible sources. It would not do for the Government to come down to Parliament and give information merely because it had been received in society, however plausible it might seem, or however authoritative the private communication. I made no answer on these occasions until after consultation with my noble Friend the Secretary for Foreign Affairs, and we then imparted to this House and to the House of Commons the information—I am perfectly aware—the slight and vague information on the subject of these atrocities as they were at first reported to us. I am well aware how slight was that information, but we gave all we could; and on subsequent occasions when we had fuller information we gave it also; and therefore I trust we may not be considered guilty of the charge made against us that the agitation in the country was occasioned by our refusing to disclose information. Now, there is not the slightest doubt that Her Majesty's Government was ill-served on that occasion—they did not receive the information they ought to have received. I beg that in saying this I may not be understood as casting any imputation on the honourable and eminent gentleman who was then and is still our Ambassador to the Court of the Sultan. It must be remembered that Sir Henry Elliot was placed at that moment in very difficult circumstances. This is a consideration which is too frequently forgotten. Constantinople was in a most critical state. Revolutions were impending which afterwards occurred, and incidents were threatening which might have been more serious than those revolutions. The mind of Sir Henry Elliot must have been on the strain during the whole of that time, and I have not the slightest doubt that any one placed in the same position would have acted in the same way. Sir Henry Elliot has a thorough knowledge of Constantinople and the Turks of that city—few men have greater—he was deficient in information as to the Provinces in which these atrocities occurred. That I attributed, and do attribute, to the Consular Service not having been adequate to the occasion, and that it had been improvidently reduced. The noble Earl mistakes me if he supposes that I made any charge against his Government in respect of that reduction. Quite the reverse. I did not at the moment clearly remember under what Government it was the Consular Service in Turkey had been reduced. Called on unexpectedly to address myself to the point, I rather thought that the reduction had been made by the Government of which I was a Member. But that matters little—whether it was by a Conservative Government or a Liberal Government—because the reduction had been made on the recommendation of a Committee of the House of Commons, and no Minister would treat the recommendation of a Committee of the House of Commons on public expenditure but with the highest respect. Therefore, there was no desire on my part to attribute to the noble Earl or the Government of which he was a Member the ill consequences, as I believe, of the reduction in the Consular Service. The noble Earl (Earl Granville) says I stated that the Consular Service had been reduced in that particular part of Turkey where those atrocities were perpetrated. I am not aware that I did so, but I do not dispute it. I never question the accuracy of a report—though I never saw one that was accurate—because I know well that if we were to be entering into controversies as to the accuracy of reports it would be impossible ever to come to a conclusion on any human affair. Therefore I do not dispute it, though I do not remember it. Now, my Lords, I do not know any instance in which the Consular Service was reduced in the immediate scene of the atrocities; but there has been a great reduction of the Consular Service in Turkey. The first Committee on the Consular Service sat in 1858, and it made many recommendations which were carried into effect. Your Lordships will find that in consequence of those recommendations six Consuls or Consular Agents were abolished in Turkey. In 1874 the Consulate at Janina, an important place, was abolished, and there was a reduction in the important post referred to by the noble Earl at Monastir, in Macedonia. There have also been reductions of Consuls to Vice Consuls. I do not wish at all to intimate that because a man is a Vice Consul only he may not be a very experienced servant of the Crown. I know there are many cases in which they have displayed much ability; but in most cases reductions

EARL GRANVILLE: Will the noble Earl state the instances in which the Consulates have been reduced to Vice Consulates?

THE EARL OF BEACONSFIELD: I have no Papers here, but I shall have no difficulty in giving the names to the noble Earl. But what I allude to is not a solitary instance. It was the remembrance of those circumstances, and speaking, as I must impress upon your Lordships, casually and to a point which I had not expected to have been raised in the debate, which induced me to make the observations I did on Tuesday night. Those localities to which the noble Earl has adverted have been and may again become scenes of great interest. They may become scenes of war, or they may become scenes of peace; but in either event they must attract constant attention. I trust they will be scenes of peace; for I do not yet despair of the common-sense of the Porte, and I have much confidence in the wise unanimity of the Great Powers; but whether they be the scenes of peace or the scenes of war, no doubt they will attract and even absorb the attention of the nation, and therefore I am sure your Lordships will hear with satisfaction that the whole subject of the Consular Agents in this part of the world has been for some time under the consideration of Her Majesty's Government, who intend to make a proposal to Parliament which, whether by changes or modifications, will we hope lead to considerable improvement in that service, and do away with those causes which, in our opinion, now impair its efficiency. I will now say a word in reply to the Question addressed to me by the noble Earl (the Earl of Rosebery) on the subject of Bulgarian atrocities. I spoke from memory; but, speaking from memory, I cannot see any substantial difference between what I stated and the facts. The facts stated by the noble Earl do not seem to be so exact as he described them to be. What happened with regard to the Berlin Memorandum? The Berlin Memorandum was communicated on the 13th of May. The first Bulgarian outrage occurred on the 1st of May; and every day was more or less signalized by excesses. If, then, the 1st of May saw the commencement of those outrages, I was not particularly unfounded in my expression when I said that those incidents occurred a fortnight before the delivery of the Berlin Note. The noble Earl referred to the case of Batak. These excesses were not known to Parliament when its attention was first called to the subject. The horrible scene that took place at Batak was not the cause of the indignation which was expressed so unmistakeably in Parliament, and especially in the House of Commons. The outrages and massacres which occasioned that great ebullition of feeling in the House of Commons were those that took place in the early part of May, and Batak, which exceeds them all in horrors and infamy, was absolutely discovered by Mr. Baring on his mission. It had not been reported by the American Missionaries or by Mr. Schuyler himself, who took such an active part in sending information to this country. Though it was undoubtedly one of the most terrible of all the scenes that occurred in Bulgaria, it was not discovered till Mr. Baring's subsequent investigations into those atrocities. When you find that the three Imperial Courts, two of which were intimately connected with that part of the world and had extensive commercial relations with it—when you find that, sitting in council on the 13th, they were not aware of massacres commenced on the 1st of May, it is a proof that however ill-informed the English Government was it was no worse off than the others. It had not the advantage of the two Imperial Courts either from its commercial relations or the presence among its subjects of those who took a very active part in these transactions: is it surprising then that the English Government should have been so ill-informed, when neither the Prussian nor Austrian Governments appeared to be cognizant of these transactions? I have endeavoured to place before you—I trust with the utmost candour—what my views are upon the subject. The spirit of my observations, as I think entirely indicated, was that there has been a large and unwise reduction of the Consular Service in Turkey, and that, though the British Government was imperfectly informed of what occurred in Bulgaria, those who had the greater advantages of position and circumstances were not better instructed.

THE EARL OF ROSEBURY observed that the noble Earl seemed to some extent to have misapprehended his Question. He had asked for an explanation of an apparent inconsistency in the noble Earl's statement that no allusion was made to these atrocities in the Berlin Memorandum, although all of them had been perpetrated a fortnight or three weeks before it was drawn up. The noble Earl's answer only showed that one of them had been committed 12 days before the presentation of that document.

THE EARL OF DERBY: My Lords, perhaps as reference has been made to the debate which took place in this House two days ago, I may be allowed—though the noble Duke who opened that discussion (the Duke of Argyll) is not now in his place—to take this opportunity of answering a Question which he then put to me, and to which I was not then able to give him a reply. Your Lordships will remember that I promised to answer him as soon as I had an opportunity of ascertaining accurately what had passed. The noble Duke expressed a curiosity, which, under the circumstances, was not unnatural, to know what was the nature of the communication referred to but not included in the Blue Book, which had been made by me towards the end of December to the Turkish Government, and which had led to a very warm expression of gratitude on the part of that Government. The noble Duke appeared to think that it must have had some reference to the proceedings of the Conference—and, I am bound to say, that was not an unreasonable suggestion. I have been able to refresh my memory upon the subject. I have also communicated with the Turkish Ambassador here, and I find that my recollection of what occurred at the time was quite accurate—namely, that this communication to which so much reference has been made, was one of no political significance whatever. It was simply a verbal expression of congratulation addressed to the Turkish Ambassador here, upon the receipt through him of official information of the accession to office of Midhat Pasha, the new Grand Vizier. It was a complimentary expression of congratulation, such as your Lordships know is not unusual on such an occasion; and on this particular occasion there was a peculiar fitness in it, for whatever has been the result, there was, no doubt, a very general belief that Midhat Pasha was a man who, on his accession to power, would carry out the reforms which had been promised. The communication was verbal, and there was no reference in it to any proceedings at the Conference, or to any political business whatever. It was simply a message of courtesy and compliment, and the expression of a hope that the new Grand Vizier would carry into effect that policy which we all desired to see. So much was it the case that no political significance was attached by me to that communication that I did not keep any record of it; and if I do not produce the document which the noble Duke asks for, it is for the most conclusive of reasons, that no such document is in existence.

EARL GRANVILLE: In the absence of the noble Duke, I may be permitted to thank the noble Earl for his courtesy in answering the Question, and to say that, in my opinion, his answer would have been satisfactory to the noble Duke had he been present. At the same time, I think it was a very natural thing for him to put the Question, seeing that the telegram had been referred to in another conversation given in the Blue Book.

THE COLORADO OR POTATO BEETLE.

QUESTION. OBSERVATIONS.

LORD STANLEY OF ALDERLEY asked the Secretary of State for the Colonies, if he can give any information respecting the progress of the Colorado or potato beetle? The noble Lord said, that as it had been reported in August last that the Colorado beetle had reached Canada, he thought it possible that his noble Friend the Secretary of State for the Colonies might be in possession of some information on the subject, and that whatever information he might give would be very acceptable to the farmers of Ireland and the North of England. It would be a satisfaction to them to know that the Government were watching the progress of this pest. He believed that the Government had already taken measures to check the entrance of these beetles at our ports, and perhaps his noble Friend would be able to confirm the paragraphs to that effect which had appeared in the Press. He hoped the Government would consider whether it might not be the safer course to prohibit the importation of all American potatoes except those which, being intended for seed, were carefully packed and sent clean and free from the beetles or their eggs.

THE EARL OF CARNARVON said, there was no doubt, as the noble Lord had said, that the question was one of considerable importance, as the ravages of the insect had been very great in the western part of America, and had created a great deal of apprehension in Canada. There was no doubt that if it were to reach this country and become acclimatized here the mischief might be very considerable. All that was possible he believed had been done. He had communicated with the Board of Trade and the Canadian Government as to the necessity of supervision over those ports from which potatoes were exported. The Board of Customs had issued two Orders on the subject—one in 1875 and one last year—in which a close examination of every ship arriving in the months of August and September laden with potatoes was enjoined. The great danger was that the insect might also be imported from Germany, for it had been found that a similar insect had been discovered in Germany, which was shown, on investigation, to be the same insect which had proved so destructive in America and Canada. All American and Canadian ships were carefully watched on coming into port, and if it should be found necessary German ships would also be watched. The Government were fully alive to the importance of the subject.

QUESTION. OBSERVATIONS.

EARL FORTESCUE, in calling attention to the outbreak of Cattle Plague in Essex and Yorkshire, and asking the Lord President what steps have been taken to prevent the spread of the disease, said, that the importation of live cattle was a trade which had sprung up in our own time and was one of the results of the adoption of the principle of free trade. Up to the passing of Sir Robert Peel's free-trade measures this country was free from the formidable cattle diseases which were known in other countries—one of which was known as the rinderpest. That disease in former years was not known in England, but was confined to the eastern parts of Europe. But the great facilities for conveyance by railway had brought the disease nearer and nearer, until finally it was introduced into this country. Now, the whole supply of live cattle and sheep to this country was very small in comparison with the immense numbers of the herds and flocks which were reared and kept in it. The last Return—that for 1875—showed that the live cattle in the United Kingdom were about 6,000,000, sheep 30,000,000, and pigs 2,000,000; while only 169,000 oxen and bulls, 58,000 cows, 34,000 sheep, 44,000 calves, and 43,000 pigs, in round numbers, were imported in 1876; so that the whole of those imported were as to cattle about one 24th part of those in this country, as to sheep about one 30th, and as to pigs about one 50th. He believed that the importation of live cattle and pigs, and certainly sheep, was, so far as they were for the purpose of slaughtering in this country, retrograding rather than increasing, for he found that the Returns for last year showed several thousands fewer than in 1875; while, on the other hand, the importation of meat was constantly and largely increasing. His own opinion was that the requests of the joint deputation of members of the Farmers' Club and of the Central Chamber of Agriculture to the Privy Council for greater protection, for foreign animals to be allowed to be landed at specified ports and not removed alive but slaughtered at the places of debarkation, ought to have been granted. Such were the main requirements which were laid before the Lord President by those bodies in June last, and to which the noble Duke returned an elaborate answer. The result proved that what was done inadequately met the necessities of the case. The recent discussions at the Central Chamber of Agriculture and Farmers Club showed that the reply of the noble Duke was considered by the farmers of England most unsatisfactory. But further, after reference to the present importation of meat from America, the Resolution passed at that meeting was that, in view of the altered circumstances of the times, it was very desirable that the slaughtering should take place at the ports of embarkation, and that only those animals should be excepted which were intended for store stock, and entered as such, and that these should be subjected to strict quarantine at the port of debarkation. His own belief was that without the slaughtering on the other side of the Channel of all animals intended for immediate conversion into meat, the very valuable flocks and herds in this country would be very inadequately protected against disease. He had been an earnest free-trader long before any of the present and many of the late Government became converted to free trade; but, he contended, that while fully supporting the principles of free trade, and admitting that it might be requisite to allow a certain quantity of store stock to be imported into this country, it was desirable from many points of view that no fat animals should come over for immediate slaughter here, but that they should be killed abroad and come here as meat. In connection with this subject there was another question which he was very earnest their Lordships should consider—and that was the cruelty inflicted upon the animals under the present system. Last year he supported the Bill to restrict the practice of vivisection; but the evils prevented by the Act were small as compared with the sufferings of animals which were imported from the Continent. If any of their Lordships had had the misfortune, as he himself had, to witness a debarkation of stock, and especially of fat stock, they would beyond question have been satisfied that the interests of humanity would be immensely promoted by the abolition of a process which inevitably entailed a dreadful amount of suffering on the poor animals. As many of their Lordships must be aware, when there was stormy weather at sea the hatches of the ships in which stock was being conveyed here had to be closed; and at the end of the voyage a number of animals were frequently found to have been suffocated. Where suffocation had not taken place, the animals were found to have suffered severely; and he could not believe that in the state in which they must necessarily be after a stormy passage they could be very desirable food for consumption in England. Now, when they found that dead meat could be imported so successfully from across the Atlantic, he considered that there could be no difficulty
